Lorentz, a native West Virginian, asked Sen. Jennings Randolph, D-W.Va., to offer a joint resolution proposing the project and a centennial celebration. Along with Rep. Jim Wright, D-Texas, he did, but it never made it out of the Rules Committee of the 96th Congress.

Last spring, a similar resolution to purchase, but not publish, the work was offered in the House with 123 co-sponsors, and in the Senate with 43 co-signers. Nothing happened.

Then, on Nov. 24, 1981, as the time for Congress to act on any proposal to commemorate Roosevelt's birthday was quickly vanishing, Congress voted to celebrate the centennial with a joint session this Wednesday and $25,000 worth of entertainment for itself. The congressional celebration will include a lecture by historian Arthur Schlesinger Jr., a song by opera star Leontyne

Price and excerpts from Roosevelt's recorded speeches.

A 920-word preamble about FDR's accomplishments, written by Lorentz for the original resolution, was replaced by two innocuous paragraphs.

To some, such a paltry commemoration by America's lawmakers on the centennial of the nation's only four-term president is a national disgrace; to others, it is simply a sign that Congress is intent on saving taxpayer dollars.

Republican Rep. Hamilton Fish Jr., whose district includes the Roosevelt home in Hyde Park, called it "an embarrassment and an indignity to the memory of a man who helped to restore faith in our country's institutions through two historic circumstances—the Depression and World War II."

Fish was disheartened, moreover, because Congress had failed to pay tribute to Roosevelt by allocating the $1.8 million that would have been required two years ago to purchase and publish the Lorentz chronology in time for the centennial.

"It is our responsibility," he said, "that the American people are able to share—in the midst of all-encompassing budget cuts—in the commemoration of this great president who epitomized hope during the most uncertain conditions . . . (It) is a personal disappointment and the nation's loss."

Lorentz, of course, shared Fish's disappointment. Not that Lorentz was looking for any profit. He wanted only to be compensated for his own expenses.

Last week, standing in his study, lined with books about the nation by authors hired by Roosevelt's public works programs during the Depression, Lorentz mused with a detailed recall of events, colorful language and wit tinged with a sense of loss.

"It's a shame that what you have is a nation of bookkeepers and body-counters, already accepting the next horror . . . with no interest in creating an ebullient spirit, proud of a national history," he said.

"Roosevelt thought in terms of history," he said, pulling from a bookshelf one of 15 volumes of Samuel Eliot Morison's History of U.S. Naval Operation in World War II. "He called Morison in and had these written to carry on a feeling of continuity of our history and some of its majesty."

Lorentz also pointed to Roosevelt's love of the written word as a reason why Congress should have published the work: Before he became president, Roosevelt wrote 41 articles, essays and historical brochures, and often wrote prefaces to books that pleased him—histories of the Hudson River, the Navy, whaling-ship history. He graduated from Harvard in 1903, but stayed on an extra year after he was elected president of the Crimson.

Lorentz testified at the hearings, "I feel my work reflects the man: It is outsize but it is easy and comfortable with no frill and flourishes as was the president's Hudson River home, his farm, the boats in which he sailed, and above all the manner in which he reported to his fellow Americans."

When Lorentz began his project in 1947, he was under contract to Harper & Bros. (now Harper & Row) Publishers to bring together a photographic chronicle. He quickly found that the market would be glutted with "quickie" histories and accounts of Roosevelt, who had died in 1945. Already such hastily written books were trying to capitalize on Roosevelt's death. Lorentz determined instead to create a more enduring document, and returned his advance money to Harper.

Encouraged by Eleanor Roosevelt, the president's widow, Lorentz hired a small staff and set to work.

Lorentz had already focused his energy on Roosevelt in 1934, when he wrote The Roosevelt Year: 1933, hailed as an innovative history because of its dramatic layout of news clippings and running headlines.

Lorentz also had a special feeling for Roosevelt. In turn, Roosevelt had been a fan of Lorentz's films, including The Plow That Broke the Plain, an account of the Dust Bowl that drew nationwide attention to the young film critic's first movie. His second film, The River, a history of the Mississippi River Basin and the effect of the Tennessee Valley Authority on the area, again illustrated the documentary's power to prompt widespread discussion.

This time, to establish a perspective not found in other presidential chronologies, Lorentz decided to set events in FDR's life side-by-side with simultaneous events in the United States and abroad. By using this counterpoint technique in his Franklin D. Roosevelt: His Life and Times, Lorentz created a companion for his traditional chronology of FDR's life.

"I've always been discontented with those historians who concentrate in narrow corridors and do not regard other events which have bearings on the history of the persons or nations they discuss," he said.

Most of Lorentz's work on the chronology was completed by 1952. A series of publishing companies expressed interest. Editors changed houses. The project languished. The climate of the nation changed radically. The effects of the McCarthy era lingered.

His detractors in that era were persuaded that Roosevelt had sold out to Stalin in peace-making after World War II by agreeing to the division of Germany, the carving up of Europe and the partitioning of Korea.

In April 1957, Mrs. Roosevelt forwarded to Lorentz a letter from her son, James, then a California congressman. Referring to the federal government's possible purchase of the chronology, he had written: "Frankly, in the present mood of the Congress, there just isn't any chance of its being agreed to, and I think it would be better not to try it."

Not until 1979 did Lorentz appear before Congress to plead for the publication of his work. He told the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration that because the Delano and Roosevelt families were close-knit and their members kept diaries, it had been possible to create a chronology that surpassed the Lincoln Chronology, the only presidential chronology published by the government.

William R. Emerson, director of the FDR Library in Hyde Park, testified in support of the Government's acquiring and publishing the Lorentz's chronology.

"Chronologies of the lives of George Washington and Abraham Lincoln were published . . . and are now collectors' items. Both Franklin Roosevelt and, perhaps more to the point, the American public, deserve no less."

Emerson said no other work on FDR rivaled Lorentz's in its comprehensiveness, and pressed for its publication.

The Senate committee authorized Elmer E. Cornwell, Jr., a professor at Brown University, to evaluate Lorentz's work. In May 1980, he reported that the work was flawed by the absence of information—such as the desk diaries of FDR and his secretaries—which had become available in the years since Lorentz finished working on the chronology.

He said a plethora of information—lists of all appointments and meetings, the records of hour-by-hour activities at the White House and nearly 1,000 press conferences Roosevelt had held during his 12 years in office—might still be added to what Lorentz had done.

Flawed though it might be, Cornwell still believed that it would be useful to scholars and recommended that the committee give serious consideration to acquiring it and donating it to the Hyde Park library.

Most senators and congressmen blamed the failure of the proposal to get out of the Senate Rules and Administration Committee on the price tag of the project, especially in a time of intense efforts to cut back government spending.

James Hemphill, who serves as executive assistant to Sen. Mark Hatfield, R-Ore., said this week, "I don't think it was any big deal. The line of questioning was 'Why should the government publish a private collection at the taxpayer's expense? There's already been a lot of work on Roosevelt. Why should they single out this work?'"

Lorentz, now 77, with his gravelly voice and West Virginia twang, was ready with a passionate rebuttal:

"That's meaningless. He has no idea of the work. It's no more a private collection than this," he said, thrusting three blue volumes of the government's chronicle of Abraham Lincoln's life. The books were purchased from the Abraham Lincoln Association and published in 1960 by the government under the auspices of the Lincoln Sesquicentennial Commission for an estimated cost of more than $1 million.

"Or this," he said, picking up a thick paperback "Herbert Hoover Reassessed." It was published by the government last year at a cost of $121,000. The foreword is written by Sen. Hatfield.

In 1974, Congress approved spending $7.4 million to build a centennial monument to Hoover, the man "who created the Depression" and whom Roosevelt defeated for the presidency, Lorentz added.

Frugality in honoring famous presidents is not an American tradition.

The George Washington bicentennial in 1932 was a clamorous and costly affair, with an average of 16,000 separate bicentennial events every day during the nine-month celebration. The official bicentennial commission's final report alone occupied five volumes. The American Tree Association planted 35 million trees in Washington's honor. The government issued 12 Washington postage stamps, seven billion of which were bought in 1932 alone, bringing the government a $1 million profit.

The first Roosevelt Centennial—cousin Theodore's—in 1958 included the greatest fireworks display the capital ever seen.

But as Lorentz has found, honoring Franklin D. Roosevelt remains a prickly and difficult mission. He remains almost as controversial today as when he was president.

A site for an FDR memorial was established years ago on the "Cherry Walk" along the Tidal Basin, between the Lincoln and Jefferson memorials, and more than $480,000 has been spent by Congress on three designs. The cost of constructing a scaled-down version of the monument is estimated at $23 million. But Congress has yet to authorize money for construction.

While $23 million may sound like a lot, it is substantially less than what was paid for other presidential memorials. The Washington Monument cost about $45.2 million and the Lincoln Memorial $37.9 million. The Jefferson Memorial cost $37.9 million to construct.

Though President Ronald Reagan looked to FDR for inspiration for his acceptance speech at the Republican convention in 1980, Reagan's contribution to the centennial is expected to be muted. In fact, the State Department is refusing to allow FDR exhibits in U.S. embassies and consulates.

The Smithsonian Institution, with a special congressional appropriation of $200,000—the only organization with federal backing for an FDR celebration—has scheduled a series of events that will focus on Roosevelt as "a master communicator."

To a large extent, Peter Kovler, a 29-year-old writer and heir to the Jim Beam distillery, has emerged as the centennial's savior, rallying organizations such as the Smithsonian to prepare what programs will take place.

"When I started looking at it, no one else was doing anything," Kovler has said.

Such statements make Lorentz bristle. He calls Kovler "a hustler."

Lorentz, who now hopes to find a private source for the publication of his work, remains convinced that politics and indifference, not money, are at the root of the failure by Congress to buy his work.

"Money is a good alibi because we have stringent times—so stringent that (Congress) gave itself a raise and made second homes in Washington, D.C., tax-exempt. The problem was that it (the $1.8 million) was so little money, it got no respect.

"No one ever said they wanted to see my canceled checks," he said. "Not one person wanted to see the work in person, though the background of those in Congress would suggest that they might have an interest in history.

"They displayed a total indifference to the man and the New Deal . . . It is tragic to have men interested only in the day-to-day affairs, in who's on first. At no time, anywhere, did I encounter any enthusiasm."

"It has been a bitter business," Lorentz wrote to a friend recently. "But when one reviews the shabby, dishonest, indolent and dangerous actions of this 97th Congress, I am only a part of a picture of what has been a record that will go down in political history as one of the worst our country ever has endured."●

NAFCU SUPPORTS BANKRUPTCY CHANGES

HON. BILLY LEE EVANS

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 28, 1982

● Mr. EVANS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, today I would like to speak to my colleagues on the subject of bankruptcy and how it affects financial institutions, specifically credit unions. I had the pleasure of addressing the annual Congressional Caucus of the National Association of Federal Credit Unions—the only national association exclusively representing the interests of federally chartered credit unions—this week. There seems to be a great concern among Federal credit union members regarding the effect of bankruptcies on the future of consumer credit for qualified borrowers with legitimate credit needs.

For many borrowers, their credit union is often the only source of consumer credit at anything less than usurious rates. It is my belief, and that of the credit union leaders I met with this morning, that the alarming increase in bankruptcy filings is due, at least in part, to certain provisions of the Bankruptcy Code of 1978. There is an increasing amount of evidence that suggests that this act does not provide the proper balance between debtors and creditors.

In September 1981, the results of a survey conducted by the National Credit Union Administration (NCUA) to determine the impact of the 1978 Bankruptcy Code on loan chargeoffs at Federal credit unions was published. It was determined that 53 percent of credit union chargeoffs due to bankruptcy were attributed to the more liberal provisions of the Bankruptcy Code. When these loan chargeoffs occur at credit unions the entire membership is penalized.

A prime example of this occurred at Navy Federal Credit Union, which is the largest credit union in the country. In 1980, the first full year of operation under the new code, there was a 60-percent rise in loan chargeoffs at Navy Federal Credit Union. This resulted in a drain on assets that worked out to approximately $5 per member.

The net result the increase in bankruptcies is having on consumers can be recognized not only in reduced dividends, but also through higher loan rates and more restrictive loan policies.

I have introduced a bill, H.R. 4786, which I believe addresses some areas for improvement of the current Bankruptcy Code. It is my hope that I will have the full support of my colleagues when this bill comes to the House floor later this year.

I urge those who are not yet supporting this measure to do so. I would like to include in the RECORD at this time a list of my distinguished colleagues who presently are listed as cosponsors of this important legislation, along with my thanks for their support.

TRADE WAR TOO STRONG? THINK ABOUT DIRTY TRADE

HON. JOSEPH M. GAYDOS
OF PENNSYLVANIA

Thursday, January 28, 1982

● Mr. GAYDOS. Mr. Speaker, when something unexpected and embarrassing happens in a crowded room, most people try to ignore it and go about what they are doing, and this seems to be the way some would have us handle the Atlantic and Pacific trade war of the 1980's.

Not one official review of the year past or projection of the year to come has touched on the economic hemorrhaging caused amoung our workers and industries by the predatory practices of our trading partners.

On social occasions, nobody is hurt and the source of the embarrassment quickly fades of its own accord.

But there will be no truce in this trade war—no reduction of casualties—unless the administration and the Congress do something to bring it about.

Workers and management across the United States are thinking about the situation and trying daily to deal with it, but they need more support than they are getting.

Although I believe that our partners are practicing trade war, the term might be too strong for others to consider at this point, and for that reason I offer the substitute of "dirty trade," which has been explored thoroughly by R. P. Simmons, president and chief executive officer of Allegheny Ludlum Steel Corp. The Company is located in Pittsburgh, part of ground zero in the trade war.

Mr. Simmons developed the term in a thoughtful article titled "The Art of Trading," which was published recently in Leaders magazine.

The smudge marks identifying dirty trade all are left by Government.

Dirty trade takes place because a government has decided to move goods as a matter of policy with the political goal of keeping home employment high. It has little to do with efficiency and technology and much to do with government ownership, government subsidy of exports and government investment.

Mr. Speaker, an argument can be made that the Japanese tax scheme on automobiles should be examined for the tell-tale smudge marks, according to information developed by the Chrysler Corp.

For example, $900 less is paid in taxes to the Japanese Government on one of their cars sold here than on one of their cars sold in Japan.

You see, they rebate that much on export, and the rebate comes off the sales price.

Meanwhile, the Japanese Government levies a $3,600 tax on a comparable American-made car going into Japan and subjects it to expensive rules and regulations.

Mr. Simmons thinks dirty trade mocks and distorts the theory of comparative advantage, which is supposed to be the guiding hand of free trade.

The United States should not be victimized by dirty trade, he said, and I agree strongly on that point.

Although I do not agree with Mr. Simmons on all points, his thoughtful exploration of the trade situation offers useful information and thought to any concerned Member of Congress, and for that reason I submit here the full text of "The Art of Trading":

THE ART OF TRADING

(By R. P. Simmons)

International trade may be the priority issue of the 1980s. Trade has always been of vital importance to trading nations who must export to survive; the explosion in energy prices since 1973 has created additional incentive for nations to export to support their purchases of energy.

At the same time, a world economy—stagnant or growing slightly, at best—has created social and political instability as unemployment and inflation combine to reduce the real standard of living in most of the nations of the world. Nations that primarily export raw material commodities are faced with significant inflation in the cost of purchased energy while the prices of commodities they export have declined. High rates of population growth in underdeveloped countries place additional strains on governments faced not only with the need to industrialize but with the greater primary requirement to feed their populations.

BEGINNING TO RESTRICT

With few exceptions, every nation in the world is faced with a need to increase exports to support its energy habit. As a result, nations are beginning to adopt restrictive trade policies which tend to hinder imports while adopting incentives to increase exports.

The social and political strains caused by unemployment and inflation in Western European nations have resulted in increased direct government ownership and subsidization of major industries such as steel, coal, automobiles and electronics. The trend is clear and alarming. While observers have recognized the involvement by governments in the business sector in socialist countries of the world, the gradual increase in government involvement by western nations of the world has been less apparent. Even in Japan, where government involvement is more subtle and less direct, involvement in the private sector is a matter of policy used to promote the economic well-being of certain selected industrial sectors.

Less developed nations distort the concept of free trade under the guise of protecting infant industries through a series of actions which include closing borders to imports of products produced within those borders; the insistence that imported products contain a high maximum percentage of local content; of export requirements imposed as a prerequisite to foreign investment locally. Even in the United States, which historically has been the world's open market, calls for increased protection are being heard more frequently.

NEW BARRIERS, GREATER STRAINS

Traditionally, trade negotiations between countries have focused on the level of tariffs. However, non-tariff barriers are beginning to cause far greater strains because of their increased use. Furthermore, such barriers are more difficult to combat because of the complex nature and in many cases, less than formal manner, in which they are applied.

The concepts of free trade are well known. Comparative advantage, if permitted to function, will determine the nation in which any given product should be produced or manufactured. This assumes that there are no barriers to restrict the flow of trade between nations. Of course there have always been some trade barriers, tariff or nontariff, between nations. However, over the past 30 years, such barriers have gradually declined as nations have agreed to reduce tariffs on a multi-lateral basis as well as to reduce other non-tariff barriers.

This trend, however, appears to have been reversed sometime in the middle 1970s, caused in significant part by the rapid increase in the price of energy. Unless reversed, the trend toward increased protection will result in a gradually intensifying trade war in which all participants will be losers.

To examine potential solutions to this problem, one must first examine the nature of international trade. Products which are exported because they truly are produced more efficiently, more productively, at lower cost or provide a technology not available in the host country should be the kind of trade which moves from one nation to another with a minimum of restraint. There are exceptions for certain strategic industries vital to each nation's national defense. However, for the most part, the country most cost-effective should be the country of production.

DIRTY TRADE

A second category of trade is that which is exported to other nations, not because it is produced more effectively or offers technological advantage, but only because such trade has become an instrument of national policy. In effect, the dirty trade reflects the intent of one nation to beggar its neighbor by export unemployment to the receiving nation. The percentage of dirty trade compared to the total amount of world trade has increased as the pressures upon political institutions increase. Direct government ownership of industries which are significant exporters, direct government subsidies for privately owned companies which are exporters, direct government investment to expand productive capacity of companies which are primarily exporters fly in the face of economic logic, distort the theory of comparative advantage as well as use capital inefficiently in order to achieve noneconomic national objectives.

Increasingly, cries are being heard throughout the world that domestic industries must be protected. However, it is important that a clear distinction be made between clean trade and dirty trade to encourage nations to protect the efficient and the technologically advanced but not the inefficient and obsolete who cannot meet the test of comparative advantage. If it were possible to achieve this distinction, a significant lessening of economic strains which are currently on the rise among trading nations could be achieved.

Political institutions respond to economic and social pressures. The role that the private sector plays in each nation can have an immense impact on the policies that will be adopted by its government. Thus, the private sector should articulate the need to avoid dirty trade and concentrate instead on those products and industries in which each nation can be most efficient.

THE CEO'S ROLE

The role of chief executive in articulating this principle cannot be understated. His position provides a unique and visible platform from which to speak on the need for free trade in both directions. It is important that we articulate the issue that nations should neither be beggared by nor accused of beggaring other trading neighbors. Being the victor in the trade contest, if we can only be victor through government subsidization, must be avoided. Nor should we be victims of dirty trade.

We cannot expect to protect our home markets and expect to have free access to other foreign markets. The trading nations of the world must avoid significant trade distortions in a given trade sector. Failure to recognize this vital point will result in high political costs to the host nation. As businessmen, we must avoid asking for nontariff barriers if we are to expect access to other markets.

It must be recognized that the trade inequity caused by dirty trade is a zero sum game in which no one trading nation can gain in any transaction unless another suffers an equivalent loss. Only when comparative advantage is permitted to function can involved nations benefit. We must remember that world trade is neither all good nor all bad. Protectionism, when it becomes a matter of national policy, will invite significant retaliation.

Protectionism, however, is not all bad when it is in defense of efficient domestic companies who are disadvantaged by government subsidization of foreign competitors. These vital trade issues will grow increasingly important. We in the private sector must insure that our nations' governments choose the right course of action.

REVERSING THE TREND

Specific steps which can be taken immediately by business leaders to reverse the trend of protectionism are:

In developing nations, business leaders must resist further attempts by government and politicians to promote investments in enterprises which are not economically viable. Such investments result in less than zero sum benefits when all costs to the economy are accumulated.

In developing nations, business leaders must vigorously promote the concepts of comparative advantage urging governments to use capital efficiently concentrating on less capital-intensive investments.

In developed nations, business leaders should urge governments to resist political pressures to protect home markets from clean trade which results in increased economic costs to the economy.

Business leaders in all nations should speak out against government practices which close, completely, the borders to specific products. This practice, intended to nurture emerging industries, can be accomplished more effectively through the use of declining quotas to permit emerging companies to develop economies of scale.

Finally, to reverse the trend toward protectionism, business leaders have a responsibility to point out the inherent inefficiencies caused by protectionism and particularly the inefficiency of non-market economies. Business leaders have a major role to play in insuring that world trade is not a zero sum game.●

(Legislative day of Monday, January 25, 1982)

The Senate met at 11 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the Honorable JOHN W. WARNER, a Senator from the State of Virginia.

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, LL.D., D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

Sovereign Lord of history and the nations, as the Senate gears up for 9 months of hard work, help the Members to begin with their priorities in order. Make then aware that their first accountability is to Thee, "For there is no authority except from God and those that exist have been instituted by God." (Romans 13: 1, RSV) Help them never to forget they are the servants of the people, "God's servants for (the peoples) good." (Romans 13: 4, RSV) Help them to realize that they need time for God, for worship and prayer and the Bible; that if they are too busy for God, they are too busy.

Give them grace not to neglect their families. Make them mindful that love for spouse is next only to love for God, that marriage is a sacred covenant sealed in Heaven. Remind them that children are a gift from God, theirs to love and support and guide to maturity. Keep them from being so busy trying to save the world that they lose their children. Help them not to use work on the Hill as an excuse to escape responsibility in the home. Preserve our families O God, that Senators may be examples in this indispensable base of all social order. We pray this in the name of the Heavenly Bridegroom who loved His bride to the death. Amen.

APPOINTMENT OF ACTING PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE DRAMATIC RESCUE OF GENERAL DOZIER

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, Gen. James Dozier is "sto bene," and for that we are grateful. The Italian police staged a daring and dramatic rescue; their efforts have dealt a severe setback to the Red Brigades.

I ask unanimous consent that an editorial which appeared in this morning's Washington Post entitled "An Italian Triumph," be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AN ITALIAN TRIUMPH

The rescue of Gen. James Dozier was a triumph of skillful and vigorous work by the Italian police. But it was part of a larger pattern. Italian justice is winning its long and desperate struggle against the terrorists.

Amidst the relief that Americans will feel, and gratitude to the Italian authorities, it's important not to miss the larger significance of the happy ending to this story. Terrorism is not confined to Italy, and the terrorists always seem, at first, to hold all the advantages. The Italian police have shown what society can do to protect itself. It is an extraordinary feat to retrieve a captive alive, and this spectacular success will be reassuring to that vast majority of people, not only in Italy, who detest terrorism, its methods and its purposes. For Italians, the Dozier case is only the most dramatic example of the remarkable capability that their police have developed in this long guerrilla war.

More than 2,000 terrorists have been arrested in Italy within the past two years. That took a lot of quiet courage on the part of the people responsible for it—not only the policemen and prosecutors, but judges, prison officials, jurors and witnesses, who encountered personal risks almost unknown in law enforcement in this country as the Red Brigades and their allies retaliated with campaigns of intimidation and assassination. But it has been clear for some time that they were losing.

The psychological atmosphere within the Red Brigades has changed drastically in the last several years. Internal morale seems to have broken down. When the gunmen were riding high, those occasionally arrested held grimly to the rule of silence. Currently, it is obvious that the suspects are telling the police quite a lot about their connections.

The Red Brigades collaborate with other organizations of the violent ultra-left from Northern Ireland to the Middle East, and there's good reason to think that some of their money comes from the Soviets, who are always happy to stir the pot. But it wasn't the Soviet money, or any other foreign support, that made terrorism a mortal threat to Italy. It was Italians' own ambivalence about national authority. That ambivalence, for the vast majority, has now evidently been resolved. The Red Brigades intended the kidnapping to be an attack on NATO. The outcome was, instead, a dramatic demonstration of Italians' determination to enforce the law, and to keep the gunmen from taking over their politics.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, there was one other item of business that was not transacted on yesterday in respect to a very distinguished American. I am referring to Adm. Hyman Rickover.

I wonder if the distinguished Senator from Washington (Mr. JACKSON) could advise the leadership at this time if he is prepared to proceed in obtaining the clearances necessary to transact that business.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Chair could draw the attention of the majority leader to the fact that the previous order also recognizes the minority leader to be first recognized before business is transacted.

Mr. BAKER. Yes; I am not proposing that we do it now. I might say to the Chair that I am inquiring of the Senator from Washington if he is prepared to do it, and I suggest that we do it during morning business.

So could the Senator from Washington advise me?

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I am prepared to advise the majority leader that it has been cleared and that we are ready to proceed.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Senator and I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, it would be my hope then that as soon as the time for the recognition of the two leaders has expired or is yielded back and during the transaction of morning business the matter that has just been identified will be dealt with. It will be my purpose to support the measure enthusiastically and to urge that the principal sponsors of this measure, the distinguished Senator from Virginia, the occupant of the chair, and the Senator from Washington, who are the principal movers of this, may make some arrangement for the rest of us to extend our greetings to Admiral Rickover some time during the day today.

Mr. President, I have no further need for my time under the standing order, and I am prepared to yield it back or will yield it to the control of a Senator or to the distinguished minority leader for his use.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, if no other Senator seeks the time, I ask the majority leader to yield such time to me.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I do so.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished majority leader.

RECOGNITION OF THE MINORITY LEADER

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GORTON). Under the standing order, the minority leader is recognized.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the Chair.

COAL EXPORTS—AN UNREALIZED POTENTIAL

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, recently the Government of West Germany entered into an unprecedented agreement with the Soviet Union to purchase, over a 25-year period, approximately $44 billion of natural gas, to be delivered via a 3,500 mile pipeline extending from western Siberia to the Soviet-Czechoslovak border. The construction of this pipeline, at an estimated cost of $10 billion is expected to be the largest single business transaction ever conducted between East and West. The German Government and other Western European nations view this venture as a necessary diversification of energy resources, especially given Europe's dependence on oil from the volatile Middle East.

The Reagan and Carter administrations both sought to dissuade our industrialized allies from proceeding with this venture, in the fear that the gas pipeline would give rise to European dependence on the Soviet Union for energy, with attendent consequences in the conduct of Western foreign policy. In response to the imposition of martial law in Poland, President Reagan properly embargoed American sales to the Soviets of equipment and technology instrumental to the construction of the pipeline. In discussions with European officials, there has always been a recognition that the development of alternate sources of energy that would reduce European vulnerability to Soviet supply interruptions was still vitally necessary. Chief among those alternative resources is American coal, which can replace imported oil in factories and powerplants at a considerably lower cost.

A series of comprehensive studies of the world coal situation have predicted massive increases in coal trade over the next two decades and a large U.S. share of that future market. These trends have already been confirmed by an astonishing growth in coal exports, which totaled 90 million tons in 1980—a 39-percent increase over 1979. Coal now supplies more than 25 percent of the world's energy; during the next 20 years, coal will supply one-half to two-thirds of the additional energy required worldwide. Such expansion of the world coal trade holds great potential for the health of our economy, in general, and for our balance-of-trade picture, in particular. But more than wishful thinking will be required to make this potential a reality. A well focused and defined governmental role in coal export policy will be critical to meeting our coal export goals.

At the conclusion of the seven-nation economic summit meeting in Tokyo in 1979, the heads of state of Canada, West Germany, France, Italy, Japan, Britain, and the United States agreed to increase coal use and production as much as possible. In an effort to build on that pledge, the same seven nations issued a communique at the conclusion of the 1980 Venice economic summit stating several points: First, that coal use and production be doubled by 1990; second, that long-term commitments by coal producers and consumers be encouraged; and third, that the economic infrastructure in both exporting and importing countries be improved to insure the targeted supply and use of coal. These commitments built upon a determination by the International Energy Agency, of which the United States is a member, that industrialized nations should, to the greatest extent possible, undertake the wholesale substitution of coal for oil. The IEA has urged coal producing and importing nations to adopt policies facilitating coal development and usage.

In concurrence with these policies, the Carter administration formed the Interagency Coal Export Task Force to study world coal supply and demand projections and to make recommendations to guide U.S. coal export policy. The task force made a number of suggestions on how to advance American coal trade, including Government sponsorship of bilateral and multilateral consultations between major coal trade partners, the establishment of a permanent U.S. international coal trade delegation, and the creation of a Federal office to monitor and promote the development of coal exports. These initiatives were only part of a broad-based program to increase domestic coal production, improve the necessary transportation infrastructure and establish a political climate that would be reassuring to coal importing nations.

To date, all that has been done on this front by the Reagan administration is to transfer responsibility for coal export policy from the moribund Department of Energy to the Department of Commerce. It sometimes appears that meritorious policies are rejected out of hand merely because they originated with the previous administration. In this instance, all the momentum that had been building toward an articulated and meaningful coal export policy has now been dissipated. The absence of any such policy by the Reagan administration jeopardizes the Nation's trade position and could seriously impair the future of American coal as an international energy resource. As witnessed by the Soviet gas pipeline deal, U.S. coal export policy will have an imporant effect on the energy security of our Western European allies, as well as on our economy at home.

There is widespread agreement within the coal industry that the U.S. coal export market will not expand to its full potential unless our Nation's harbors are deepened to permit the entry of the new generation of colliers now coming into service. New colliers of 150,000 tons or more are expected to offer a 30- to 50-percent transportation cost advantage over older, smaller ships, thus making American coal a more economically attractive source of energy. America's port facilities are antiquated, as evidenced by the long lines of ships waiting to load at Baltimore and Hampton Roads, the two largest U.S. coal ports. These sites were designed to handle small volumes of metallurgical coal used in steel manufacturing, rather than large volumes of steam coal used in utility boilers. With estimates that U.S. coal exports might reach 200 million tons by 1990, it is certain that necessary improvements must be immediately undertaken.

The cost of dredging Baltimore, Hampton Roads, New Orleans, and Mobile ports to a depth of 55 feet is at least $1.5 billion in 1980 dollars. Improvement of other ports seeking the coal export business could exceed $4 billion. These costs did not fit into the Reagan administration's budget-cutting plans, no matter what economic and trade benefits would accrue. The administration submitted to the Congress and supports legislation which would require port authorities to privately finance 100 percent of the costs of dredging harbors to depths greater than that which now exists. Such an approach reflects a complete reversal of policies which have guided waterway development for the last 150 years.

Full Government responsibility for dredging is considered by some to be an unnecessary subsidy to private industry. Undoubtedly, in this day of competing interests for a shrinking Federal dollar, the role of the Government in financing new port construction and improvements must be reexamined. In these times, it is appropriate that shipping companies and their customers should bear some significant portion of the dredging costs along with the Federal Government. But it is equally appropriate to argue that port improvements should be viewed in terms of national, rather than exclusively private, interests. Some of the benefits of this activity do not accrue to specific parties, but to broad regions of the country, to the Nation as a whole, and even on an international scale, to U.S. allies and foreign policy interests. Some Federal responsibility may be critical to the initiation and completion of these projects.

When speaking of local interests, coal exports have particular importance to the West Virginia economy. Last year West Virginia produced 44.1 million tons of coal for exports—almost 50 percent of all coal exported. That translates into thousands of jobs and millions of dollars in State and local tax revenues. There are no deepwater ports in the great State of West Virginia, but administration policy on these issues is of great significance to our economic future. Without a coherent positive policy, the United States could lose a substantial share of the future coal export market. We cannot afford to allow that to happen.

I ask unanimous consent that an article from the December 14 issue of Fortune magazine be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ENERGY—THE COAL-EXPORT GAMBLE

[From Fortune magazine, Dec. 14, 1981]

(By David Fairbank White)

The forecast is stunning: by the year 2000, most experts agree, U.S. shipments of coal abroad will exceed today's colossal exports of grain. Demand has already grown so strong that a frustrated armada of colliers was kept at anchor off Hampton Roads, Virginia, this year, waiting months to load coal for Europe and Asia. Hoping to prosper from the coming trade, U.S. ports are launching their fastest and most dramatic expansion of export capacity ever. Total investment in new coal terminals could reach $4 billion as the ports make changes unparalleled since the container revolution lifted the face of waterfronts.

Coal fever has hit the coasts with such a wallop, in fact, that what was once a critical shortage of loading complexes now shows all the signs of becoming a glut. Across the country, 45 new terminals are being built or planned at 29 harbors on three coasts; if they are all completed, U.S. coal-loading capacity will top 625 million tons per year. This vastly exceeds even the Department of Energy's bullish projections that 250 million tons will be shipped overseas annually by the turn of the century—a 342% increase over today's level. (These export projections and figures on terminal capacity exclude the Canadian trade; Canada will buy some 15 million tons of U.S. coal this year and isn't expected to increase imports much.)

"I'm assuming somebody in these businesses has been doing some market studies and knows what he's doing," says Baltimore's port administrator, W. Gregory Halpin. As aggressive a port developer as any in the nation, Halpin is himself hardly immune to coal fever. Baltimore has 14 million tons of export-terminal capacity and is building 22 million more. "I have only one comment," says Halpin in his modern office high above the harbor crescent. "Ship it through Baltimore."

GROW OR DIE

Many proposed terminals will probably never be built, and some on the Mississippi may earn their basic income on domestic traffic. (About 740 million tons of coal will be consumed in the U.S. this year.) But the temptation to overbuild seems irresistible. Coal companies, railroads, barge lines, terminal builders, and local governments all want to profit from the export business.

Each entity has its own special stake in the outcome. For the authorities that run the harbors, coal shipments mean jobs, income for local businesses, tax revenues. For big coal companies, terminals ensure that their product can move. For railroads and barge lines, the race is to protect their traditional livelihoods and to expand their markets. Each competitor is driven by the desire to grow and the fear of dying.

Entering the business for the first time, the Virginia Port Authority, a government body, will put up 25 million tons of capacity at Hampton Roads, one of the biggest projects in the country. In Baltimore, Consolidation Coal, a Conoco subsidiary, has begun building a $100-million terminal that may ultimately handle 12.5 million tons annually from mines in Pennsylvania that the company owns with West German investors. Dravo Corp. is adding 240 barges to its Dravo Mechling fleet plying the inland waterways and, in its capacity as designer and builder, is planning terminals for operators situated from Chesapeake Bay to Puget Sound. On all three coasts, wherever grumbling machinery speeds the black mineral into the holds of waiting colliers, boom times are here and gloom is hard to find.

Crucial in the contest to handle coal traffic is access to the right kind of coal. Hardly a homogeneous product, coal is not even predictably black; most lignites are dark brown. Coal generally falls into two categories. Metallurgical coal is used in steelmaking, and until 1979 almost all U.S. coal exports were of "met" coal. But the projected growth in European and Asian demand is for steam coal, burned mainly by utilities to generate power.

Two important properties are required of steam coal—low sulfur and high energy content. As an antipollution measure, many governments limit sulfur content, often to 1 percent or less. And the more energy coal produces when burned, the more valuable it is. A buyer must purchase, transport, and handle 300 tons of coal rated at 8,000 BTUs per pound to get the same energy he would derive from 200 tons of 12,000-BTU coal.

A recent national survey of spot prices for steam coal FOB mine gives an idea of the extraordinary range in values. Wyoming and Idaho coal rated at 8,000 BTUs per pound and 1 percent sulfur recently sold for $7.50 per ton. Illinois coal rated at 10,500 BTUs per pound and 3 percent sulfur went for $19 per ton. Southern West Virginia and eastern Kentucky coal rated at 12,000 BTUs with a sulfur content of 1 percent cost $35 per ton. The latter is a hot commodity on any pier in the country.

WHERE ADVANTAGE LIES

Almost as important as coal grade is transportation cost from mine to port. CSX Corp.'s Chessie line and the Norfolk & Western Railway, which haul Appalachian coal to Hampton Roads, charge $14.72 to $15.37 per ton, depending on the distance from mine to terminal. In addition, both railroads charge for loading the coal aboard ship: 46 cents per ton at the N&W terminal and 74 cents at Chessie's. All together, it costs $15.18 to $16.11 to get a ton of Appalachian coal aboard ship at Hampton Roads. At Baltimore, served by the Chessie, export rail rates run as low as $14, loading included, while Mobile, Alabama, another low-cost port, has transportation and loading costs as low as $10.25.

These factors give the principal ports exporting Appalachian coal—Hampton Roads, Baltimore, and Mobile—a commanding advantage over competitors. While western coal is available in vast quantities, it has serious drawbacks as an export commodity. The Northern Great Plains deposits are low in energy content, and high-grade Rocky Mountain coal has to travel 1,000 miles, often across mountain peaks, to the nearest port. By contrast, the greatest reserves of low-sulfur, high-BTU coal in the U.S., some 18.7 billion tons, lie in the majestic Appalachian deposits, beginning far up in Pennsylvania and extending down to Alabama. The eastern railroads can carry this premium-quality coal out of the mountains on an easy downhill run to the sea. Little wonder that the ports with access to this coal are fighting to maintain their edge, while every other port in the country is striving to compete with their economics.

These economics have made Chesapeake Bay the Persian Gulf of coal. Its waters carry over four-fifths of all coal shipped overseas from the U.S., more than the exports of any of America's chief rivals—Poland, Australia, and South Africa. Of the two coal ports on the Chesapeake, Hampton Roads is king. The Monitor and Merrimack fought the battle of the ironclads there, and coal runs as thick as history. Hampton Roads is expected to send 50 million tons abroad this year, almost two-thirds of all U.S. overseas shipments. Rolf Williams, chairman of Anders Williams & Co. and a prominent shipping agent whose livelihood comes from the vessels that call at Hampton Roads, is keenly watching the scramble for coal traffic. "We are very concerned," says Williams. "We will suffer if other ports get the business."

THE BATTLE FOR TRAFFIC

The two most important defensive players at Hampton Roads are the Norfolk & Western Railway and the Chessie line, which carry virtually every pound of coal into the harbor. Both are assured of new terminal capacity, which will prepare Hampton Roads, with its tremendous natural advantages, to handle a monumental increase in traffic. The Chessie has sold parcels of land served by its tracks to the A. T. Massey Coal Co. and to Dominion Terminal Corp., a consortium of Westmoreland Coal, Armco, Ashland Coal, and Utah International; both groups will construct terminals of their own. The tracks of the Chessie and Norfolk & Western will feed into the 25-million-ton-per-year superterminal to be developed by the Virginia Port Authority. "If we can get this facility built," says Port Authority Executive Director J. Robert Bray, "we can put Virginia miners to work."

The proposed Port Authority terminal recently won a fierce battle for traffic with a competing proposal put forward by Parsons Brinckerhoff, an engineering and project-development firm. Pittston, Consolidation, Island Creek, and others have agreed to send their coal through the Port Authority terminal, but Parsons Brinckerhoff insists it will still try to develop a facility of its own. Thus Hampton Roads, which now has an export-loading capacity of just over 50 million tons a year, will be adding at least 55 million tons and perhaps 90 million. Shipping agent Williams says the new construction leaves the port confident but wary: "We're afraid of Mobile and New Orleans."

Not to mention the harbor just 150 miles up the bay at Baltimore, which is expanding even faster than Hampton Roads and could lure away traffic. With a 157% increase in coal-export capacity already abuilding, Baltimore will soon be able to ship 36 million tons a year. Beyond that, two groups are talking about adding 25 million tons more. Finally, Baltimore has an ace up its sleeve. It is the only major coal port in the nation that has obtained federal authorization for dredging to deepen its channel. If it can get the money to pay for the job (some $322 million is necessary), Baltimore could be in a commanding position to grab traffic.

Ocean-shipping costs are being radically altered by the proliferation of supercolliers, coal's counterpart of the supertankers that revolutionized oil transport in the Sixties and Seventies. The huge coal ships, which at 1,000 feet are almost as long as the Empire State Building is tall, provide significant economies of scale. While many supercolliers are active in world trade, they cannot take on a full load at U.S. coal ports, because at 100,000 deadweight tons they require a channel depth of about 50 feet. No major U.S. coal port is deeper than 45 feet.

Many ports have applied for the right to deepen their channels, but the approval process is still back in the age of the clipper ship. Approvals routinely take 20 years, though Congress is considering legislation to speed up the action. If Baltimore can deepen its channel to 50 feet, a 110,000-ton supercollier loading there could knock $4 off the current $15-a-ton cost of carrying coal to Amsterdam in a 60,000-ton vessel.

Mobile is after Appalachian coal, too. While the port can't economically handle traffic from the northern mines, southern producers in Tuscaloosa and Birmingham are less than 300 miles away by rail or barge. Gerry Robinson, general traffic manager of the Alabama State Docks Department, surveys the machinery that is sprawled over 100 acres of the impressive McDuffie Island export-coal terminal and pronounces it "a classic example of understated southern elegance." But there's nothing understated about McDuffie or what's happening to it. Backed by a $53-million bond issue, the coal station will more than double capacity, to 23.5 million tons, within two years.

A LONG WAY TO KENOVA

One hundred forty miles west, on the lower Mississippi, New Orleans and other cities are enjoying and unprecedented coal-export boom. The activity may seem surprising since the New Orleans area is not the most economical place from which to ship Appalachian coal. The distances make handling it expensive, even when it is carried to portside by low-cost barge. For example, Dravo estimates that coal from the Kenova area in West Virginia, which can be hauled and loaded at Hamption Roads for around $15 a ton, would cost $20 a ton delivered and loaded at New Orleans. In many cases, the port is better situated to handle lower-quality midwestern coal, which can't be economically shipped to the East Coast and so follows the winding track of the inland waterway system that drains from lower Illinois into the Mississippi and the Gulf.

But despite its handicaps, New Orleans shows promise of becoming a muscular, and perhaps disruptive, competitor. European and Asian customers have been flocking there because they have been getting poor service in the East. During the most serious logjams on Chesapeake Bay, foreign coal buyers descended on the ports, aghast at the disruptions. If a vessel is forced to wait in port, its charterer must pay demurrage, a waiting charge, just as a passenger pays the meter on a taxi stuck in traffic. Demurrage on a 60,000-ton collier can come to $15,000 a day. That's 25 cents a ton of coal for each day's waiting, $1.75 a week, $7.50 a month. Before long, demurrage charges can wipe out the East Coast ports' cost advantages.

Mary Ann Heider, manager of the bulk department at Anders Williams & Co. in the port of Hampton Roads, recalls the reaction of a group of visiting foreign customers during the worst delays. "They did some heavy threatening," she remembers. "They screamed and screamed and screamed." Their message: "We've either got to come to some arrangement or we'll go elsewhere."

Elsewhere, in many cases, has been New Orleans. When export demand picked up on the Mississippi, stevedoring companies began loading coal from barges directly onto colliers in the middle of the Mississippi. Midstreaming, as it's called, is a river technique long used for loading metal ore, grain, and meal. Floating derricks with clamshell buckets sling the coal from feeder barges into the ships' holds. Half a dozen stevedoring companies can load coal in midstream, at $2.75 per ton.

IN SEARCH OF SECURITY

Land-terminal operators saw the opportunity to get in on the business and are now looking to expand existing facilities or add new ones. No fewer than eight terminals—totaling nearly 50 million tons of capacity—are being planned along the lower Mississippi. "There's almost a Klondike fever in this whole coal thing," says Executive Port Director Edward S. Reed. The largest coal mover will be Louis H. Meece, president of International Marine Terminals, a husky, silver-haired entrepreneur who gained broad experience in coal-terminal facilities as a barge-company executive. Meece is undertaking an expansion that will nearly quadruple capacity at his terminal south of New Orleans to 15 million tons a year.

The question is whether the demand will continue once Baltimore, Hampton Roads, Mobile, and other ports increase their capacities. Marsden W. Miller, Jr., president of Miller Coal Systems of Baton Rouge, Louisiana, returned from a recent European tour thinking that foreign customers would be willing to pay a premium for coal shipped through New Orleans to be certain that an alternative to the eastern ports is available. "As long as you're within a dollar or two," he says, "what the buyer wants is security."

But if terminal operators don't get long-term commitments from foreign customers, they may find their facilities operating way below capacity. Magnolia Coal Co. has broken ground on new facilities without long-term contracts, and U.S. Steel's River & Gulf Transportation Co. is thinking about doing the same. Whether that makes sense will depend on how many terminal operators have similar ideas—and whether overcapacity gives foreign customers a chance to whipsaw their suppliers.

As if anticipating a future of overcapacity and rate wars, the terminal operators are looking hard at their economics. Meece believes that new eastern coal terminals will be more expensive than present facilities because they will have heavier capital costs to recover. While the loading fee at the N&W terminal is now only 46 cents, he thinks new East Coast terminals will have to charge $3 to $4. That could be enough to destroy their transportation-cost advantage.

HERE COME THE INDIANS

In answer, eastern terminal developers are negotiating with the N&W and the Chessie to cut the costs of moving coal from mine to port. For example, the Chessie says it is considering a reduction of about $2 a ton in the cost of shipping coal by unit train into Consolidation Coal's new terminal in Baltimore. In answer to that, New Orleans operators are continually pressing for lower unit-tow rates on the Mississippi and other rivers. With many rates still being considered, it is too early to tell whose economics may turn out most favorable.

Other competitors could come out of nowhere. D. K. Ludwig, 84, plans to anchor a warehouse ship in Delaware Bay that could receive coal from barges and transfer it to 140,000-ton supercolliers. The Tulalip Indian tribe has retained Dravo to study the feasibility of building a 15-million-ton terminal on tribal land at Possession Sound, Washington. And the Sun Eel Shipping Co. of South Korea has obtained a contract to export coal at Seward, Alaska.

New York's harbor handles hardly any coal today, but that doesn't mean it wouldn't love to. The Port of New York and New Jersey has a marvelous advantage. The 12-mile channel from Ambrose Light to the piers on Staten Island and Port Jersey is much shorter than the entrances to other U.S. coal ports. New York could be dredged to 60 feet for less money than it would take to dredge any other port to 50 feet. A port 60 feet deep could accommodate supercolliers of 200,000 deadweight tons, nearly twice the size of any that has so far entered a U.S. harbor.

Local authorities are now thinking about putting up the $140 million needed to deepen the channel themselves. That would avoid the lengthy federal authorization process. New York officials are sounding out foreign coal buyers to see if they would be interested in contracting for coal that Conrail could haul from Appalachia to the harbor. If they do show interest, New York could build 24 million tons of terminal capacity.

WHERE CHIPS ARE PILED

With coal terminals being built or planned at 29 harbors, the winners are hard to pick, but it's clear where the betting is heaviest. The chips are piled highest on the old and classic formula: coal from the Appalachian fields moving through Chesapeake Bay. As the market explodes, Hampton Roads will surely find its dominance eroded, but it will still reign as king. Elsewhere, terminals that have not yet broken ground face the risk of being instantaneously superfluous. Those that build without having their traffic ensured by long-term contract face cutthroat competition. Indeed, the coal trade looks like a marvelous opportunity. For the brave.

I now yield time that is under my control to Mr. WARNER and then will yield to Mr. JACKSON.

AUTHORIZATION FOR PRESENTATION OF A SPECIALLY STRUCK GOLD MEDAL TO ADM. HYMAN GEORGE RICKOVER

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I am joined today by the distinguished Senator from Washington in asking that unanimous consent be given to a third reading and followed by a voice vote of a bill sponsored by myself, the Senator from Washington (Mr. JACKSON), and the distinguished Senator from South Carolina (Mr. THURMOND), who is unable to be here today.

Before doing so, however, I should like to invite all those in the Senate and others who desire to pay their respects to Admiral Rickover to come to the Vice President's office immediately upon recess of the Senate this morning.

Mr. President, a group of us in the Senate who have been privileged for many years to work with this distinguished American have endeavored to seek out a way that Congress could properly recognize the contribution to national defense and to the untold thousands of men and women in the U.S. Navy that Admiral Rickover has made.

Various Members of the Senate, including myself, have talked to the good admiral. I can only relate that he was, indeed, reluctant that anything be done.

It is surprising, of course, particularly in reading the paper today, to know that there is an element of this man's personality that strikes of great humility and that humility was expressed time and time again when I and others endeavored to persuade him to be present at a joint session of Congress as we did yesterday in honor of President Roosevelt, or any other means. He declined them all. He acknowledged that possibly if Congress were to recognize him again as they did once before in 1958 with a congressional medal he, in all probability, would receive it.

Hastily I researched the history of this medal, and yesterday I stated, as the bill was introduced, that he would be the first in history to have ever recieved two of these medals should the House of Representatives join in this effort.

During the late hours of last night further research proved me to be in error. One other American has been recognized more than once. As a matter of fact, Zachary Taylor received three such medals during the period of the 1840's.

Nevertheless, I think there is a good opportunity that Admiral Rickover, as he goes on to his next career, might indeed perform such act so as to make him eligible again for recognition by Congress and, perhaps, even exceed Zachary Taylor's record.

Mr. President, I am also grateful to the chairman of the Banking Committee, and the chairman of the Budget Committee, who polled their respective committees such that this measure could be acted upon today by unanimous consent.

It was thought that, perhaps, we would set this for another day in the Senate when more Senators would be present. But again the decision was made to do it today in view of the fact that Admiral Rickover will retire, as I understand it, on Sunday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to resuming consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate resumed consideration of the bill (S. 2018).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the bill by title.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 2018) to authorize the presentation on behalf of the Congress of a specially struck gold medal to Admiral Hyman George Rickover.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 818

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, at this time I send an amendment to the desk and ask the clerk to read it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Virginia (Mr. WARNER) proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 818:

On page 2, line 21, strike the period and "There are authorized to be appropriated" and insert a comma and the following: "with a value".

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I understand there is no objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (UP No. 818) was agreed to.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I now yield the floor to the senior Senator from Washington.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington is recognized.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I spoke at some length yesterday, as did the distinguished Senator from Virginia, about the distinguished record of the man whom we honor today, Adm. Hyman Rickover.

I would like to supplement my remarks by making a few additional observations. There is something that is truly American about the life of this individual. It is the great American story.

Admiral Rickover was born in that part of Russia, which moved back and forth between Polish and Russian rule. At the age of 5 years he came to the United States, to Chicago, where his father was to work at the tailor's bench until he literally died at the bench close to 90 years of age.

I think this family trait of lifelong service tells us something about the man that we honor because if anyone has ever given meaning to the words "work ethic" it is Admiral Rickover. Here is a man who has been totally committed and dedicated to his country with not just ordinary work, but work that demanded excellence. Mr. President, he set the example for all of the officers who were to go into the nuclear side of the Navy as to what was expected of them. Incidentally, anyone who could survive the renowned Rickover interview could survive any future obstacle. Admiral Rickover, an engineer by profession, had a special genius for cross-examination, the art of which has not been equaled even in Anglo-Saxon law.

This is one of the outstanding characteristics of the man because he wanted the best management team possible, so he picked the individuals who would be dedicated to their assignment. He knew from the outset if anything went haywire on the nuclear side that the entire nuclear Navy program could be endangered.

Both Senator WARNER and I remarked yesterday that if the civilian nuclear power industry had that same management philosophy, that same sense of excellence, that same commitment, we would not be in the situation in which we find ourselves today with a lot of problems in the civilian nuclear power industry, which is so important to meeting the Nation's energy requirements.

So I can say as one who has worked with him since 1949, when I was in the House on the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, that I have never known a man who is more selfless, more committed to the service of his country, than Adm. Hyman George Rickover. He has made a contribution to the security of this Nation that is without equal in our history.

I would further add, Mr. President, that we are all in his debt not only for what he has accomplished but also for the example he has set for others to follow in the years to come. One of the legacies of his service to this country is the large number of people in the Navy, the Defense Establishment, private engineering and when it relates to the industry, the Government, and universities, all of whom have been profoundly influenced by their association with Admiral Rickover.

So I join with all my colleagues in saluting Admiral Rickover on this occasion, which is an eventful day for the American people.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, may I ask the distinguished Senator from Virginia to yield to me briefly?

Mr. WARNER. I yield to the majority leader.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I wish to take this opportunity of extending my congratulations to the Senator from Virginia and the Senator from Washington for this initiative. I applaud them for it and I enthusiastically support it as I always have enthusiastically supported the historic efforts and initiative of Admiral Rickover in the defense of our country.

He is a man of history, Mr. President. We owe him a debt of gratitude not only for his individual service but for the precept and example which he has supplied to the modern American Navy and, indeed, for this Nation.

So, Mr. President, I join in wishing him well in his next career, and I urge the adoption of this measure as the smallest token of a nation's appreciation for a job well done.

Mr. WARNER. I thank the majority leader.

I yield to the minority leader.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I to thank the distinguished Senator from Virginia (Mr. WARNER) and the distinguished Senator from Washington (Mr. JACKSON) for the initiative they have taken. I wish to express my personal appreciation to them for having taken it. I think they have done a service for the Senate and for the country.

I share their thoughts with respect to Admiral Rickover. He is truly a selfless, dedicated, brilliant patriot and the services that he has rendered will always not only be admired but be services for which the country will always be indebted. I too wish him well as he enters into his new career. I can assure him that he will always live in the hearts of his countrymen as a truly great American.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I thank both the majority leader and the minority leader, as well as the chairmen and members of both the Banking and Budget Committees. This expeditious treatment by the U.S. Senate would not have been possible had it not been for the complete cooperation and enthusiastic assistance of the leadership of the Senate, together with members of those two committees.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I rise in support of S. 2018. It is my pleasure to cosponsor this bill that would honor Admiral Rickover by awarding him a second congressional gold medal.

Admiral Rickover began an illustrious naval career 60 years ago upon his graduation from the U.S. Naval Academy.

In his early career he distinguished himself in duty at sea and duty on land. He served in the surface fleet and subsurface fleet and became qualified to command surface ships and submarines. He later commanded a minesweeper, the U.S.S. Finch.

On August 6, 1945, in the skies over Hiroshima, one of Admiral Rickover's Annapolis classmates spent a few moments arming an atomic bomb that would help end a war. Shortly thereafter, Admiral Rickover began work to harness that same power to prevent war.

His tour of duty at the helm of the nuclear reactors program spanned more than three decades and the terms of seven Presidents. He not only designed the nuclear Navy, he built it; and because of the force of his leadership, the quality of our nuclear ships is unmatched.

Admiral Rickover's accomplishments and decorations are legion. He was previously honored by the U.S. Congress in 1958 with a first award of the congressional gold medal, and because of his contributions to the Navy's shipbuilding program, part of the engineering complex at the Naval Academy bears his name.

He is a distinguished author, professional naval officer and a patriot whose devotion to duty and this country make him worthy of our highest accolades and heartfelt gratitude.

It is befitting and proper that he be awarded the congressional gold medal for the second time.

● Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I rise in support of S. 2018, a bill to authorize the presentation of a specially struck gold medal to Adm. Hyman G. Rickover. I am proud to be a cosponsor of this legislation.

For the past 63 years, Admiral Rickover has served his country well as a naval officer and as an apostle of the use of nuclear propulsion.

Admiral Rickover has rightfully been called the father of our nuclear Navy. His perserverance in the face of skepticism insured that the United States would lead the world in the development of nuclear power as a means of naval propulsion. All the nuclear ships in our Navy, from the first nuclear-powered submarine, the U.S.S. Nautilus, to the first Trident missile-firing submarine, the U.S.S. Ohio, serve as monuments to Admiral Rickover's genius.

One of Admiral Rickover's finest legacies is his complete dedication to strict standards of safety which have permitted the safe operation of hundreds of nuclear reactors on naval vessels.

On the occasion of Admiral Rickover's retirement from his long career of service to his country, it is only fitting that the Congress formally recognize his great contributions by authorizing the striking of a special gold medal in his honor.●

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I think we can proceed to third reading and passage of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate and open to amendment. If there be no amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill (S. 2018) was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Congress finds and declares that—

(1) Admiral Hyman George Rickover has served his country for sixty-three years with the highest distinction, with uncommon dedication, and with great honor as an officer of the United States Navy;

(2) Admiral Rickover has pioneered the development of nuclear reactor technology for the propulsion of naval vessels, has provided the expertise to construct the world's first true submersible, and thereby has revolutionized the concepts of naval warfare;

(3) with an unswerving faith in, and devotion to, the United States of America, Admiral Rickover has contributed to the defense of our Nation and to the peaceful development of nuclear reactor technology for the world by developing and constructing the first full-scale nuclear electrical generating plant in the United States;

(4) Admiral Rickover has developed and maintained standards of safety for the use of nuclear energy which have permitted the continued safe operation of naval nuclear reactor plants from their inception to the one hundred and sixty-one plants in operation today; and

(5) Admiral Rickover has for many years provided the Congress of the United States his uncompromising, independent, and candid advice, and greatly assisted the Congress of the United States in its deliberations on the issues of national defense, nuclear energy, environmental protection, and other important matters.

SEC. 2. (a) The Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President pro tempore of the Senate are authorized to present, on behalf of the Congress, to Admiral Hyman George Rickover, a gold medal of appropriate design in recognition of his distinguished service to the United States and for his unique world-renowned contributions to the development of safe nuclear energy and to the defense of the United States of America. For such purpose, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to cause to be stricken a gold medal with suitable emblems, devices, and inscriptions to be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, with a value not to exceed $21,000 to carry out the provisions of this subsection.

(b) The Secretary of the Treasury may cause duplicates in bronze of such medal to be coined and sold under such regulations as he may prescribe, at a price sufficient to cover the cost thereof, including labor, materials, dies, use of machinery, and overhead expenses, and the appropriation used for carrying out the provisions of this subsection shall be reimbursed out of the proceeds of such sale.

(c) The medals provided for in this Act are national medals for the purpose of section 3551 of the Revised Statutes (31 U.S.C. 368).

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. WARNER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

(Mr. WARNER assumed the chair.)

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. There will now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business.

THE UGLY SPECTER OF TERRORISM

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, I rise today in honor of the happy occasion of the safe recovery of Brig. Gen. James Dozier and to commend the Italian Government for its outstanding success in rescuing the general. There has been no other event for which I have so hoped and prayed during the course of the last 6 weeks.

I admire the courage and apparent resilience of General Dozier and extend my congratulations to the reunited Dozier family. I cannot overemphasize my gratitude for the skilled and resourceful efforts of the Italian Government and its police forces. They performed exceptionally, in the finest traditions of law enforcement agencies in free and democratic nations.

As an illustration that we can, indeed, defend ourselves against darkness and terror without descending to the tactics of terror and repression, the work of the Italian authorities will stand as a proud monument among free nations.

I would prefer to continue my remarks unencumbered by any sad words on this occasion, but I question whether anyone who watched newscasts last evening could help but feel their delight at the general's release somewhat diminished by the subsequent report of the premeditated terrorist murder of Turkish diplomat Kemal Arikan in Los Angeles.

We are rightfully joyful over the safety of our fellow American, but while Italy's Red Brigades have already suffered by their latest action, terrorism continues to increase worldwide.

I wish to extend my sympathies to Mr. Arikan's family and to the Turkish Government for this most unfortunate act on our own soil.

I am confident, however, that American authorities will be no less thorough and no less dedicated in their efforts to bring these criminals to justice than were Italian police during the last 42 days.

The events of the last 6 weeks have again brought home to all of us the ugly specter of terrorism. This period has served to remind us that we live in a dangerous and sometimes twisted world in which caution alone is not enough to quell terrorism.

It is for this reason that the administration's stated focus on international terrorism is so well taken. During an era in which many speak of loose international alliances joining terrorist groups together and during which even irresponsible governments join in the organized sponsorship of these despicable practices, I believe that the administration has charted a wise course.

I hope that the safe recovery of General Dozier and the effective work of the Italian Government will inspire and make more firm our own resolve to check and to suppress international terrorism.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama.

RESTORING VETERANS' BENEFITS

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I am pleased and honored to join my friend and colleague from Arkansas, Mr. BUMPERS, in sponsoring the Veterans Burial Benefits Amendments Act of 1982 which is designed to correct one of the most grievous errors ever made by this Government.

The error I am referring to is the stripping away of the traditional $300 burial and funeral expense benefit from the vast majority of American war veterans.

The burial benefit was eliminated for all but those war veterans who are eligible for VA compensation or pensions by the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1981. Because of this unconscionable decision, thousands of indigent war veterans have been denied the basic right of a decent burial.

Mr. President, the veterans' burial benefit is not a Government giveaway program, but a basic right earned by the Nation's veterans. Uncle Sam made a contract with those who risked their lives in service of their country. The Government told American war veterans that, in return for their willingness to make the ultimate sacrifice for their country, the Government would insure that the veteran receive a decent burial.

The U.S. Government simply must not go back on its pledge to its veterans.

In 1981, before the burial allowance was taken away on October 1, 361,500 veterans received burial benefits. Obviously, there is no way of knowing how many veterans will be denied their burial allowance this year, but we do know the program has been slashed by $75.2 million for fiscal year 1982. The total cost of the program for 1981 was only $113 million—a small price for the Federal Government to pay to live up to its commitment to its war veterans.

Without the burial benefit, families of tens of thousands of veterans will now be forced to bear the entire burden of spiraling funeral expenses. Estimates show that five out of every six war veterans have lost the burial benefit that was once theirs.

Mr. President, these veterans deserve better.

Today there are more than 26 million American war veterans. Of these, 3.5 million are 65 years of age or older. We have an obligation to these veterans who served during our Nation's wars and we cannot count on already-financially strapped State and local governments to take up the slack and meet these new and unexpected demands.

I am a veteran of World War II myself. I thank God that I have been fortunate since I fought on the beaches in the Pacific as a Marine and I am not in a financial bind where my family would be burdened by funeral and burial expenses. But what of those veterans who do face serious economic difficulties, whose families would be financially devastated by the expense of a decent funeral service and burial?

Mr. President, the answer to that question should be clear to every Senator in this Chamber.

I believe the promises made by the Government to its veterans are sacred vows indeed. This Government cannot turn its back on its veterans in their final hour of need.

I have been a strong and consistent supporter of veterans' programs and I intend to fight to have this basic burial benefit restored.

Mr. President, I am pleased to be a joint sponsor of the Veterans' Burial Benefits Amendments Act of 1982. This important piece of legislation would restore the burial benefit to those veterans who have served this Nation in its hour of need with courage, dignity and honor.

I commend my friend and colleague from Arkansas, Mr. BUMPERS, for his leadership on this crucial matter and I urge the full Senate to give this legislation its immediate and favorable consideration.

Thank you.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GORTON). The distinguished minority leader is recognized.

SOVIET BRUTALITY IN AFGHANISTAN

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, we now have reports that the Soviets have turned to even more brutal tactics in attempting to crush the forces of nationalism in Afghanistan.

The January 26, 1982, edition of the Christian Science Monitor carried a story that French doctors, assisting inside Afghanistan, have reported systematic bombings of civilian targets in that country.

The Monitor story reported:

French medical organizations operating clandestine health teams inside Afghanistan have accused the Soviet Union of systematically bombing civilian targets in an attempt to demoralize villagers and deny guerrilla forces local support.

This charge comes from the Paris-based Doctors Without Frontiers and International Medical Aid.

Doctors who have served in Afghanistan assisting the general populace with their medical needs assert:

. . . Communist pacification efforts have failed and Soviet-backed government forces have recently adopted a policy of deliberately bombing villages, farms, hospitals, and crops.

One doctor described Soviet activities as a ". . . reign of terror."

The Monitor story reported that the doctors attacked the Soviet Union for its:

. . . "Brutal and widespread" use of antipersonnel "butterfly bombs" as well as boobytrapped objects such as toys, cigarette packs, and pens. Such objects, they said, are scattered by helicopter over fields, villages, and mountain paths, causing heavy casualties among both inhabitants and livestock.

Children are the main victims, as they have a tendency to pick up everything out of curiosity.

Mr. President, I think the behavior of the Soviet Union in Afghanistan should outrage the sensibilities of the entire civilized world. What we are seeing is genocidal behavior by the Soviet Union because they have discovered the people of Afghanistan will fiercely fight for their independence. I think it is incumbent upon this administration to focus constant attention on the Soviet atrocities being perpetrated upon the people of Afghanistan.

I ask unanimous consent that the article from the Christian Science Monitor be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Christian Science Monitor, Jan. 26, 1982]

SOVIETS ACCUSED OF CIVILIAN BOMBINGS IN AFGHANISTAN

FRENCH DOCTORS SAY ATTACKS USED TO DISCOURAGE AID TO GUERRILLAS

(By Edward Girardet)

French medical organizations operating clandestine health teams inside Afghanistan have accused the Soviet Union of systematically bombing civilian targets in an attempt to demoralize villagers and deny guerrilla forces local support.

According to the Paris-based Doctors Without Frontiers (DWF) and International Medical Aid (IMA), communist pacification efforts have failed and the Soviet-backed government forces have recently adopted a policy of deliberately bombing villages, farms, hospitals, and crops. DWF and IMA are two of the three French groups working in eight different Afghan provinces.

The doctors also maintain that the Soviets have increasingly turned to helicopter and MIG attacks because the guerrillas have used improved tactics to destroy so many communist tanks and other armored vehicles in recent months.

Until now the doctors had remained discreet about their activities in resistance-held areas to prevent Soviet attack. But they decided to speak up last week at a Paris news conference when it became clear to them that the Soviets have begun to mount what one doctor described as a "reign of terror."

"We feel it is now up to world public opinion to pressure the Russians into stopping such atrocities," said Dr. Claude Malhuret, the DWF spokesman.

The conference provided details on Soviet aerial bombardments provided by recently returned doctors from as far inland as Hazarajat in the central highlands of Afghanistan. The two volunteer medical organizations showed color slides of bombed hospitals, shattered villages, injured villagers, and smouldering foodstores.

The French, who have up to 25 doctors working in Afghanistan at any one time for periods up to six months, said they have not been able to accumulate any firm evidence of chemical warfare despite numerous reports from local inhabitants.

But the doctors strongly attacked the Soviet Union for its "brutal and widespread" use of antipersonnel "butterfly bombs" as well as boobytrapped objects such as toys, cigarette packs, and pens. Such objects, they said, are scattered by helicopter over fields, villages, and mountain paths, causing heavy casualties among both inhabitants and livestock.

"Children are the main victims, as they have a tendency to pick up anything out of curiosity," said Dr. Malhuret.

The Soviet Embassy in Paris has strongly denied the accusations of the French doctors. "It is absolutely inconceivable that the Soviet Union would ever resort to such inhuman methods," said a senior embassy spokesman.

When asked about allegations that three French hospitals were deliberately bombed over a two-day period and the continued use of antipersonnel mines, the official said: "There is absolutely no truth in their charges. Mistakes can often happen during wartime, but photographs can also be falsified."

L'Humanite, a French communist daily and staunch supporter of Soviet policy, has adopted a similar line. The Communist Party itself has remained quiet about the charges, but the newspaper maintained that the "alleged" use of antipersonnel mines and other so-called "atrocities" is part of American propaganda.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MATTINGLY). Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR RECOGNITION OF SENATOR SPECTER ON TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 1982

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Senator SPECTER be granted a 15-minute special order following the special orders already granted for Tuesday, February 2.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AUTHORIZATION FOR PRODUCTION OF DOCUMENTS BY THE SENATE COMMITTEE ON LABOR AND HUMAN RESOURCES

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, I send a resolution to the desk on behalf of Senator BAKER and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the resolution by title.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 300) authorizing production of documents by the Senate Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, the Special Prosecutor, Leon Silverman, appointed by the special court to take charge of the investigation of allegations concerning Secretary of Labor Raymond J. Donovan, has asked the Senate Committee on Labor and Human Resources to produce documents compiled by the committee in its own investigation of that matter. This resolution under Senate rule XI will authorize the committee to provide the Special Prosecutor with the documents it has obtained that may have a bearing on his investigation. These documents are executive department documents, public records, correspondence with executive departments, and media reports. The resolution is not authority for testimony of any kind. By providing these documents, the committee does not intend to waive the Senate's privileges with respect to materials not produced or testimony.

Accordingly, I ask that this resolution be adopted authorizing production of documents by the Senate Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 300) was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

The resolution, with its preamble, is as follows:

S. RES. 300

Whereas, the Special Prosecutor appointed to investigate allegations concerning Secretary of Labor Raymond J. Donovan has requested the Senate Committee on Labor and Human Resources to produce documents bearing on his investigation;

Whereas, by the privileges of the Senate of the United States and rule XI of the Standing Rules of the Senate, no evidence under the control or in the possession of the Senate can, by the judicial process, be taken from such control or possession but by permission of the Senate;

Whereas, when it appears that documents, papers, and records under the control of or in the possession of the Senate are needful for use in a formal investigation for the promotion of justice, the Senate will take such action thereon as will promote the ends of justice consistently with the privileges and rights of the Senate: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the chairman and the ranking minority member of the Senate Committee on Labor and Human Resources, acting jointly, are authorized to produce to the Special Prosecutor executive department documents, public records, correspondence with executive departments, and media reports compiled by the committee which may bear on allegations concerning Secretary of Labor Raymond J. Donovan.

2. The committee shall maintain an inventory of all documents which the chairman and the ranking minority member authorize to be produced to the Special Prosecutor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be stated by title.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 301) to commemorate the 20th anniversary of the United States Senate Youth Program.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 301) was considered and agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

The resolution, with its preamble, is as follows:

S. RES. 301

Whereas, the first week in February, 1982, marks the 20th anniversary of the United States Senate Youth Program;

Whereas, this Program brings to Washington each year two senior high school students from each state, the District of Columbia, and the Department of Defense Dependents Schools for a week's visit to meet their respective Senators and observe the functioning of the Congress, the Executive Branch and the United States Supreme Court; and

Whereas, said student delegates are selected by their respective State Superintendents of Schools on the basis of high scholastic grades and outstanding leadership abilities: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate recognizes with satisfaction that this year marks the 20th anniversary of this worthy Program, commends the William Randolph Hearst Foundation for establishing and providing financial support for the program, and hopes that the program will continue to enable outstanding high school students to obtain a first hand knowledge of the operations of the Congress and the Federal Government.

By Mr. EXON:

S. 2033. A bill to revise the price support program for milk for the period beginning October 1, 1982, and ending September 30, 1985, to revise the program for wheat and feed grains for the 1982 through 1985 crops, to increase the borrowing authority for the Commodity Credit Corporation, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

AGRICULTURAL ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1982

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation which, if enacted into law, will help enable our family farmers to ride out this current depressed state of agriculture, which has only been worsened by the terms of the agriculture legislation passed by the Congress late last year.

This legislation will restore price supports for wheat, corn, and dairy to those levels originally contained in the bill reported to the floor of the U.S. Senate in S. 884 in May 1981. As my colleagues will remember when the Senate considered S. 884 in September of last year, amendments were adopted which significantly reduced the price supports for wheat, corn, and dairy. During that debate on these amendments, I rose to object to the adoption of these reduced price support programs believing that they would surely spell a continued decline in our agriculture economy. During the recent recess, I became increasingly alarmed at the effects the current recession was having on our farm economy. What became even more evident was the fact that the 1981 farm bill was inadequate to meet the needs of our grain and dairy farmers.

As my colleagues will see, this legislation will increase price supports for wheat, corn, and dairy to those levels the Senate Agriculture Committee reported in S. 884 in May 1981. These levels were considered by the Agriculture Committee members to be a modest upward adjustment in target and loan rates as well as meeting the desires of the administration's fiscal policy of reduced Federal expenditures. Unfortunately, these modest support levels were attacked as being excessive by the Reagan administration and a successful effort was launched to further reduce these support levels from the original committee bill. This was a part of the grand strategy by the Reagan administration to break up the traditional farm coalition, as admitted to by the President's Budget Director. During our debate on these debilitating amendments, I strongly opposed their adoption warning my colleagues that their enactment would emasculate the bill and exacerbate an already rapidly deteriorating economic climate in the grain- and dairy-producing areas of this Nation. Mr. President, I stand here today and say to this body that it is the opinion of this Senator that those statements have been proven correct.

There is another provision of this legislation which is of critical importance not only to the farmers of this Nation but to the Commodity Credit Corporation's ability to meet heavy borrowing which is taking place in the Grain Belt as our farmers move in large numbers to enter the reserve program. Presently, the CCC has a statutory ceiling on its borrowing authority of $25 billion. This total authority, however, has been limited to $20 billion by the appropriations process. Mr. President, it is widely known that the Commodity Credit Corporation is rapidly approaching this $20 billion limit. In fact, it has been estimated by the USDA that it will be reached sometime in the next few days, possibly as soon as February 1 of this year.

It is critical that the Senate move on this matter rapidly in order that we avert a disastrous situation of the CCC literally running out of borrowing authority.

Mr. President, I commend this modest bill to the attention of my colleagues. It is my sincere hope that this legislation will receive serious consideration by this body and that we may move expeditiously to enact the measure into law and thereby give our family farmers the type of support they need to survive.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of this bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2033

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Agricultural Act Amendments of 1982."

TITLE I—DAIRY

MILK PRICE SUPPORT

SEC. 101. (a) Section 201(c) of the Agicultural Act of 1949 (7 U.S.C. 1446(c)) (as amended by section 103 of the Agricultural and Food Act of 1981) is amended by striking out everything after the first sentence and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "Notwithstanding the foregoing, effective for each of the fiscal years during the period beginning October 1, 1982, and ending September 30, 1985, whenever the Secretary estimates that the net cost of Government price support purchases of milk or the products of milk will exceed $500,000,000 or that net Government price support purchases of milk or the products of milk will exceed 3.52 billion pounds (milk equivalent) during any fiscal year, the price of milk beginning on October 1 of such fiscal year shall be supported at such level, as determined by the Secretary, not less than 70 per centum of the parity price therefor.".

(b) Section 201 of the Agricultural Act of 1949 (7 U.S.C. 1446) (as amended by section 103 of the Agriculture and Food Act of 1981) is amended by adding after subsection (c) the following new subsection:

"(d) Notwithstanding the provisions of subsection (c) of this section, effective for the period beginning on October 1, 1982, and ending September 30, 1985, the Secretary shall adjust the support price of milk to not less than 70 per centum of the parity price therefor on April 1 of each fiscal year, if on that date the support price of milk is below 70 per centum of the parity price therefor.".

TITLE II—WHEAT

LOAN RATES, TARGET PRICES, DISASTER PAYMENTS, WHEAT ACREAGE REDUCTION PROGRAM, AND LAND DIVERSION FOR THE 1982 THROUGH 1985 CROPS OF WHEAT

SEC. 201. Effective only for the 1982 through 1985 crops of wheat, section 107B of the Agricultural Act of 1949 (as added by section 301 of the Agriculture and Food Act of 1981) is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 107B. Notwithstanding any other provision of law—

"(a) The Secretary shall make available to producers loans and purchases for each of the 1982 through 1985 crops of wheat at such level, not less than $3.50 per bushel, as the Secretary determines will maintain the competitive relationship of wheat to other grains in domestic and export markets after taking into consideration the cost of producing wheat, supply and demand conditions, and world prices for wheat.

"(b)(1)(A) In addition to loans and purchases under subsection (a), the Secretary shall make available to producers payments for each of the 1982 through 1985 crops of wheat in an amount computed as provided in this subsection. Payments for any such crop of wheat shall be computed by multiplying (i) the payment rate, by (ii) the farm program acreage for the crop, by (iii) the farm program payment yield for the crop. In no event may payments be made under this paragraph for any crop on a greater acreage than the acreage actually planted to wheat.

"(B) The payment rate for wheat shall be the amount by which the higher of—

"(i) the national weighted average market price received by farmers during the first five months of the marketing year for such crop, as determined by the Secretary, or

"(ii) the loan level determined under subsection (a) of this section for such crop, is less than the established price per bushel.

"(C) For the 1982 through 1985 crops of wheat, the established price shall not be less than $4.20 per bushel for the 1982 crop, $4.40 per bushel for the 1983 crop, $4.60 per bushel for the 1984 crop, and $4.80 per bushel for the 1985 crop. Any such established price may be adjusted by the Secretary as the Secretary determines to be appropriate to reflect any change in (i) the average adjusted cost of production per acre for the two crop years immediately preceding the year for which the determination is made from (ii)) the average adjusted cost of production per acre for the two crop years immediately preceding the year previous to the one for which the determination is made. The adjusted cost of production for each of such years may be determined by the Secretary on the basis of such information as the Secretary finds necessary and appropriate for the purpose and may include variable costs, machinery ownership costs, and general farm overhead costs, allocated to the crops involved on the basis of the proportion of the value of the total production derived from each crop.

"(D) The total quantity on which payments would otherwise be payable to a producer on a farm for any crop under this paragraph shall be reduced by the quantity on which any disaster payment is made to the producer for the crop under paragraph (2) of this subsection.

"(2)(A) Except as provided in subparagraph (C) of this paragraph, effective with respect to the 1982 through 1985 crops of wheat, if the Secretary determines that the producers on a farm are prevented from planting any portion of the acreage intended for wheat to wheat or other nonconserving crops because of drought, flood, or other natural disaster, or other condition beyond the control of the producers, the Secretary shall make a prevented planting disaster payment to the producers on the number of acres so affected but not to exceed the acreage planted to wheat for harvest (including any acreage which the producers were prevented from planting to wheat or other nonconserving crop in lieu of wheat because of drought, flood, or other natural disaster, or other condition beyond the control of the producers) in the immediately preceding year, multiplied by 75 per centum of the farm program payment yield established by the Secretary times a payment rate equal to 33⅓ per centum of the established price of the crop.

"(B) Except as provided in subparagraph (C) of this paragraph, effective with respect to the 1982 through 1985 crops of wheat, if the Secretary determines that because of drought, flood, or other natural disaster, or other condition beyond the control of the producers, the total quantity of wheat which the producers are able to harvest on any farm is less than the result of multiplying 60 per centum of the farm program payment yield established by the Secretary for such crop by the acreage planted for harvest for such crop, the Secretary shall make a reduced yield disaster payment to the producers at a rate equal to 50 per centum of the established price for the crop for the deficiency in production below 60 per centum for the crop.

"(C) With respect to the 1982 through 1985 crops of wheat, producers on a farm shall not be eligible for disaster payments under this paragraph if crop insurance is available to them under the Federal Crop Insurance Act with respect to their wheat acreage.

"(D) Notwithstanding the provisions of subparagraph (C) of this paragraph, effective only for the 1982 through 1985 crops of wheat, the Secretary may make disaster payments to producers on a farm under this paragraph whenever the Secretary determines that—

"(i) as the result of drought, flood, or other natural disaster, or other condition beyond the control of the producers, producers on a farm have suffered substantial losses of production either from being prevented from planting wheat or other nonconserving crop or from reduced yields, and that such losses have created an economic emergency for the producers;

"(ii) Federal crop insurance indemnity payments and other forms of assistance made available by the Federal Government to such producers for such losses are insufficient to alleviate such economic emergency, or no crop insurance covered the loss because of transtitional problems attendant to the Federal crop insurance program; and

"(iii) additional assistance must be made available to such producers to alleviate the economic emergency.

The Secretary may make such adjustments in the amount of payments made available under this subparagraph with respect to individual farms so as to assure the equitable allotment of such payments among producers taking into account other forms of Federal disaster assistance provided to the producers for the crop involved.

"(c)(1) The Secretary shall proclaim a national program acreage for each of the 1982 through 1985 crops of wheat. The proclamation shall be made not later than August 1 of each calendar year for the crop harvested in the next succeeding calendar year. The Secretary may revise the national program acreage first proclaimed for any crop year for the purpose of determining the allocation factor under paragraph (2) of this subsection if the Secretary determines it necessary based upon the latest information, and the Secretary shall proclaim such revised national program acreage as soon as it is made. The national program acreage for wheat shall be the number of harvested acres the Secretary determines (on the basis of the weighted national average of the farm program payment yields for the crop for which the determination is made) will produce the quantity (less imports) that the Secretary estimates will be utilized domestically and for export during the marketing year for such crop. If the Secretary determines that carryover stocks of wheat are excessive or an increase in stocks is needed to assure desirable carryover, the Secretary may adjust the national program acreage by the amount the Secretary determines will accomplish the desired increase or decrease in carryover stocks.

"(2) The Secretary shall determine a program allocation factor for each crop of wheat. The allocation factor for wheat shall be determined by dividing the national program acreage for the crop by the number of acres that the Secretary estimates will be harvested for such crop, except that in no event shall the allocation factor for any crop of wheat be more than 100 per centum nor less than 80 per centum.

"(3) The individual farm program acreage for each crop of wheat shall be determined by multiplying the allocation factor by the acreage of wheat planted for harvest on the farms for which individual farm program acreages are required to be determined. The wheat acreage shall not be further reduced by application of the allocation factor if the producers reduce the acreage of wheat planted for harvest on the farm from the previous year by at least the percentage recommended by the Secretary in the proclamation of the national program acreage made not later than August 1 prior to the year in which the crop is harvested. The Secretary shall provide fair and equitable treatment for producers on farms on which the acreage of wheat planted for harvest is less than for the preceding year, but for which the reduction is insufficient to exempt the farm from the application of the allocation factor. In establishing the allocation factor for wheat, the Secretary may make such adjustments as the Secretary deems necessary to take into account the extent of exemption of farms under the foregoing provisions of this paragraph.

"(d) The farm program payment yield for each crop of wheat shall be the yield established for the farm for the previous crop year, adjusted by the Secretary to provide a fair and equitable yield. If no payment yield for wheat was established for the farm in the previous crop year, the Secretary may determine such yield as the Secretary finds fair and reasonable. Notwithstanding the foregoing provisions of this subsection, in the determination of yields, the Secretary shall take into account the actual yields proved by the producer, and neither such yields nor the farm program payment yield established on the basis of such yields shall be reduced under other provisions of this subsection. If the Secretary determines it necessary, the Secretary may establish national, State, or county program payment yields on the basis of historical yields, as adjusted by the Secretary to correct for abnormal factors affecting such yields in the historical period, or, if such data are not available, on the Secretary's estimate of actual yields for the crop year involved. If national, State, or county program payment yields are established, the farm program payment yields shall balance to the national, State, or county program payment yields.

"(e)(1) Notwithstanding any other provision of this section, the Secretary may impose a limitation on the acreage planted to wheat if the Secretary determines that the total supply of wheat will, in the absence of such limitation, be excessive taking into account the need for an adequate carryover to maintain reasonable and stable supplies and prices and to meet a national emergency. Such limitation shall be achieved by applying a uniform percentage reduction to the wheat acreage base for each wheat-producing farm. Producers on a farm who knowingly produce wheat in excess of the permitted wheat acreage for the farm shall be ineligible for wheat loans, purchases, and payments with respect to that farm. The acreage base for any farm for the purpose of determining any reduction required to be made for any year as the result of a limitation imposed by the Secretary under this paragraph shall be the acreage planted on the farm to wheat for harvest (including any acreage which the producers were prevented from planting to wheat or other nonconserving crop in lieu of wheat because of drought, flood, or other natural disaster, or other condition beyond the control of the producers) in the crop year immediately preceding the year for which the determination is made or, at the discretion of the Secretary, the average acreage planted to wheat for harvest in the two crop years immediately preceding the year for which the determination is made. The Secretary may make adjustments to reflect established crop-rotation practices and to reflect such factors as the Secretary determines should be considered in determining a fair and equitable base. A number of acres on the farm determined by dividing (A) the product obtained by multiplying the number of acres required to be withdrawn from the production of wheat times the number of acres actually planted to such commodity, by (B) the number of acres authorized to be planted to such commodity under the limitation imposed by the Secretary (hereinafter in this subsection referred to as 'reduced acreage') shall be devoted to conservation uses, in accordance with regulations issued by the Secretary, which will assure protection of such acreage from weeds and wind and water erosion. However, the Secretary may permit, subject to such terms and conditions as the Secretary may prescribe, all or any part of the reduced acreage to be devoted to sweet sorghum, hay and grazing or the production of guar, sesame, safflower, sunflower, castor beans, mustard seed, crambe, plantago ovato, flaxseed, triticale, oats, rye, or other commodity, if the Secretary determines that such production is needed to provide an adequate supply of such commodities, is not likely to increase the cost of the price support program, and will not adversely affect farm income.

"(2) The Secretary may conduct a land diversion program and make land diversion payments to producers of wheat if the Secretary determines that such payments will assist in obtaining necessary adjustments in the total acreage of wheat. If a land diversion program is in effect under this subsection, the Secretary may also require that producers participate in such program as a condition of eligibility for loans, purchases, and payments authorized by this section. Land diversion payments shall be made to a producer on a farm who devotes an acreage of cropland on the farm to conservation uses approved by the Secretary in accordance with a land diversion contract entered into with the Secretary. The amounts payable to a producer under a land diversion contract shall be determined by such means as the Secretary determines appropriate, including the submission of bids for such contracts. In determining the acceptability of a contract offer, the Secretary shall take into consideration the extent of the diversion to be undertaken by the producer and the productivity of the acreage diverted. The Secretary shall limit the total acreage to be diverted under agreements in any county or local community so as not to affect adversely the economy of the county or local community.

"(3) The reduced acreage and the diverted acreage may be devoted to wildlife food plots or wildlife habitat in conformity with standards established by the Secretary in consultation with wildlife agencies.

"(4) An operator of a farm desiring to participate in the program conducted under this subsection shall execute an agreement with the Secretary providing for such participation no later than such date as the Secretary may prescribe. The Secretary may by mutual agreement with the producer, terminate or modify any such agreement entered into under this subsection if the Secretary determines such action necessary because of an emergency created by drought or other disaster or to prevent or alleviate a shortage in the supply of agricultural commodities.

"(f) In any case in which the failure of a producer to comply fully with the terms and conditions of the program conducted under this section precludes the making of loans, purchases, and payments, the Secretary may, nevertheless, make such loans, purchases, and payments in such amounts as the Secretary determines to be equitable in relation to the seriousness of the failure. The Secretary may authorize the county and State committees established under section 8(b) of the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act to waive or modify deadlines and other program requirements in cases in which lateness or failure to meet such other requirements does not adversely affect the operation of the program.

"(g) The Secretary may issue such regulations as the Secretary determines necessary to carry out the provisions of this section.

"(h) The Secretary shall carry out the program authorized by this section through the Commodity Credit Corporation.

"(i) The provisions of section 8(g) of the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act (relating to assignment of payments) shall apply to payments under this section.

"(j) The Secretary shall provide for the sharing of payments made under this section for any farm among the producers on the farm on a fair and equitable basis.

"(k) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, compliance on a farm with the terms and conditions of any other commodity program may not be required as a condition of eligibility for loans, purchases, or payments under this section.".

TITLE III—FEED GRAINS

LOAN RATES, TARGET PRICES, DISASTER PAYMENTS, FEED GRAIN ACREAGE REDUCTION PROGRAM, AND LAND DIVERSION FOR THE 1982 THROUGH 1985 CROPS OF FEED GRAINS

SEC. 301. Effective only for the 1982 through 1985 crops of feed grains, section 105B of the Agricultural Act of 1949 (as added by section 401 of the Agriculture and Food Act of 1981) is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 105B. Notwithstanding any other provision of law—

"(a)(1) The Secretary shall make available to producers loans and purchases for each of the 1982 through 1985 crops of corn at such level, not less than $2.60 per bushel, as the Secretary determines will encourage the exportation of feed grains and not result in excessive total stocks of feed grains after taking into consideration the cost of producing corn, supply and demand conditions, and world prices for corn.

"(2) The Secretary shall make available to producers loans and purchases for each of the 1982 through 1985 crops of grain sorghums, barley, oats, and rye, respectively, at such level as the Secretary determines is fair and reasonable in relation to the level that loans and purchasers are made available for corn, taking into consideration the feeding value of such commodity in relation to corn and other factors specified in section 401(b) of this Act.

"(b)(1)(A) The Secretary shall make available to producers payments for each of the 1982 through 1985 crops of corn, grain sorghums, oats, and, if designated by the Secretary, barley, in an amount computed as provided in this subsection. Payments for any such crop of feed grains shall be computed by multiplying (i) the payment rate, by (ii) the farm program acreage for the crop, by (iii) the farm program payment yield for the crop. In no event may payments be made under this paragraph for any crop on a greater acreage than the acreage actually planted to such feed grains.

"(B) The payment rate for corn shall be the amount by which the higher of—

"(i) the national weighted average market price received by farmers during the first five months of the marketing year for such crop, as determined by the Secretary, or

"(ii) the loan level determined under subsection (a) of this section for such crop, is less than the established price per bushel.

"(C) For the 1982 through 1985 crops of corn, the established price shall not be less than $2.80 per bushel for the 1982 crop, $2.95 per bushel for the 1983 crop, $3.10 per bushel for the 1984 crop, and $3.25 per bushel for the 1985 crop. Any such established price may be adjusted by the Secretary as the Secretary determines to be appropriate to reflect any change in (i) the average adjusted cost of production per acre for the two crop years immediately preceding the year for which the determination is made from (ii) the average adjusted cost of production per acre for the two crop years immediately preceding the year previous to the one for which the determination is made. The adjusted cost of production for each of such years may be determined by the Secretary on the basis of such information as the Secretary finds necessary and appropriate for the purpose and may include variable costs, machinery ownership costs, and general farm overhead costs, allocated to the crops involved on the basis of the proportion of the value of the total production derived from each crop.

"(D) The payment rate for grain sorghums, oats and, if designated by the Secretary, barley, shall be at such rates as the Secretary determines fair and reasonable in relation to the rate at which payments are made available for corn.

"(E) The total quantity on which payments would otherwise be payable to a producer on a farm for any crop under this paragraph shall be reduced by the quantity on which any disaster payment is made to the producer for the crop under paragraph (2) of this subsection.

"(2) (A) Except as provided in subparagraph (C) of this paragraph, effective only with respect to the 1982 through 1985 crops of feed grains, if the Secretary determines that the producers on a farm are prevented from planting any portion of the acreage intended for feed grains to feed grains or other nonconserving crops because of drought, flood, or other natural disaster, or other condition beyond the control of the producers, the Secretary shall make a prevented planting disaster payment to the producers on the number of acres so affected but not to exceed the acreage planted to feed grains for harvest (including any acreage which the producers were prevented from planting to feed grains or other nonconserving crop in lieu of feed grains because of drought, flood, or other natural disaster, or other condition beyond the control of the producers) in the immediately preceding year, multiplied by 75 per centum of the farm program payment yield established by the Secretary times a payment rate equal to 33⅓ per centum of the established price for the crop.

"(B) Except as provided in subparagraph (C) of this paragraph, effective only with respect to the 1982 through 1985 crops of feed grains, if the Secretary determines that because of drought, flood, or other natural disaster, or other condition beyond the control of the producers, the total quantity of feed grains which the producers are able to harvest on any farm is less than the result of multiplying 60 per centum of the farm program payment yield established by the Secretary for such crop by the acreage planted for harvest for such crop, the Secretary shall make a reduced yield disaster payment to the producers at a rate equal to 50 per centum of the established price for the crop for the deficiency in production below 60 per centum for the crop.

"(C) With respect to the 1982 through 1985 crops of feed grains, producers on a farm shall not be eligible for disaster payments under this paragraph if crop insurance is available to them under the Federal Crop Insurance Act with respect to their feed grain acreage.

"(D) Notwithstanding the provisions of subparagraph (C) of this paragraph, effective only for the 1982 through 1985 crops of feed grains, the Secretary may make disaster payments to producers on a farm under this paragraph whenever the Secretary determines that—

"(i) as the result of drought, flood, or other natural disaster, or other condition beyond the control of the producers, producers on a farm have suffered substantial losses of production either from being prevented from planting feed grains or other nonconserving crop or from reduced yields, and that such losses have created an economic emergency for the producers;

"(ii) Federal crop insurance indemnity payments and other forms of assistance made available by the Federal Government to such producers for such losses are insufficient to alleviate such economic emergency, or no crop insurance covered the loss because of transitional problems attendant to the Federal crop insurance program; and

"(iii) additional assistance must be made available to such producers to alleviate the economic emergency.

The Secretary may make such adjustments in the amount of payments made available under this subparagraph with respect to individual farms so as to assure the equitable allotment of such payments among producers taking into account other forms of Federal disaster assistance provided to the producers for the crop involved.

"(c)(1) The Secretary shall proclaim a national program acreage for each of the 1982 through 1985 crops of feed grains. The proclamation shall be made not later than November 1 of each calendar year for the crop harvested in the next succeeding calendar year. The Secretary may revise the national program acreage first proclaimed for any crop year for the purpose of determining the allocation factor under paragraph (2) of this subsection if the Secretary determines it necessary based upon the latest information, and the Secretary shall proclaim such revised national program acreage as soon as it is made. The national program acreage for feed grains shall be the number of harvested acres the Secretary determines (on the basis of the weighted national average of the farm program payment yields for the crop for which the determination is made) will produce the quantity (less imports) that the Secretary estimates will be utilized domestically and for export during the marketing year for such crop. If the Secretary determines that carryover stocks of feed grains are excessive or an increase in stock is needed to assure desirable carryover, the Secretary may adjust the national program acreage by the amount the Secretary determines will accomplish the desired increase or decrease in carryover stocks.

"(2) The Secretary shall determine a program allocation factor for each crop of feed grains. The allocation factor for feed grains shall be determined by dividing the national program acreage for the crop by the number of acres that the Secretary estimates will be harvested for such crop, except that in no event shall the allocation factor for any crop of feed grains be more than 100 per centum nor less than 80 per centum.

"(3) The individual farm program acreage for each crop of feed grains shall be determined by multiplying the allocation factor by the acreage of feed grains planted for harvest on the farms for which individual farm program acreages are required to be determined. The feed grain acreage shall not be further reduced by application of the allocation factor if the producers reduce the acreage of feed grains planted for harvest on the farm from the previous year by at least the percentage recommended by the Secretary in the proclamation of the national program acreage made not later than November 1 prior to the year in which the crop is harvested. The Secretary shall provide fair and equitable treatment for producers on farms on which the acreage of feed grains planted for harvest is less than for the preceding year, but for which the reduction is insufficient to exempt the farm from the application of the allocation factor. In establishing the allocation factor for feed grains, the Secretary may make such adjustment as the Secretary deems necessary to take into account the extent of exemption of farms under the foregoing provisions of this paragraph.

"(d) The farm program payment yield for each crop of feed grains shall be the yield established for the farm for the previous crop year, adjusted by the Secretary to provide a fair and equitable yield. If no payment yield for feed grains was established for the farm in the previous crop year, the Secretary may determine such yield as the Secretary finds fair and reasonable. Notwithstanding the foregoing provisions of this subsection, in the determination of yields, the Secretary shall take into account the actual yields proved by the producer, and neither such yields nor the farm program payment yield established on the basis of such yields shall be reduced under other provisions of this subsection. If the Secretary determines it necessary, the Secretary may establish national, State, or county program payment yields on the basis of historical yields, as adjusted by the Secretary to correct for abnormal factors affecting such yields in the historical period, or, if such data are not available, on the Secretary's estimate of actual yields for the crop year involved. If national, State, or county program payment yields are established, the farm program payment yields shall balance to the national, State, or county program payment yields.

"(e) (1) Notwithstanding any other provision of this section, the Secretary may impose a limitation on the acreage planted to feed grains if the Secretary determines that the total supply of feed grains will, in the absence of such limitation, be excessive taking into account the need for an adequate carryover to maintain reasonable and stable supplies and prices and to meet a national emergency. Such limitation shall be achieved by applying a uniform percentage reduction to the feed grain acreage base for each feed grain-producing farm. Producers on a farm who knowingly produce feed grains in excess of the permitted feed grain acreage for the farm shall be ineligible for feed grain loans, purchases, and payments with respect to that farm. The acreage base for any farm for the purpose of determining any reduction required to be made for any year as the result of a limitation, imposed by the Secretary under this paragraph shall be the acreage planted on the farm to feed grains for harvest (including any acreage which the producers were prevented from planting to feed grains or other nonconserving crop in lieu of feed grains because of drought, flood, or other natural disaster, or other condition beyond the control of the producers) in the crop year immediately preceding the year for which the determination is made or, at the discretion of the Secretary, the average acreage planted to feed grains for harvest in the two crop years immediately preceding the year for which the determination is made. The Secretary may make adjustments to reflect established crop-rotation practices and to reflect such other factors as the Secretary determines should be considered in determining a fair and equitable base. A number of acres on the farm determined by dividing (A) the product obtained by multiplying the number of acres required to be withdrawn from the production of feed grains times the number of acres actually planted to such commodity, by (B) the number of acres authorized to be planted to such commodity under the limitation imposed by the Secretary (hereinafter in this subsection referred to as 'reduced acreage') shall be devoted to conservation uses, in accordance with regulations issued by the Secretary, which will assure protection of such acreage from weeds and wind and water erosion. However, the Secretary may permit, subject to such terms and conditions as the Secretary may prescribe, all or any part of the reduced acreage to be devoted to sweet sorghum, hay and grazing or the production of guar, sesame, safflower, sunflower, castor beans, mustard seed, crambe, plantago ovato, flaxseed, triticale, oats, rye, or other commodity, if the Secretary determines that such production is needed to provide an adequate supply of such commodities, is not likely to increase the cost of the price support program, and will not adversely affect farm income.

"(2) The Secretary may conduct a land diversion program and make land diversion payments to producers of one or more of the crops of corn, barley, oats, rye, and grain sorghums if the Secretary determines that such payments will assist in obtaining necessary adjustments in the total acreage of any of these feed grains. If a land diversion program is in effect for one or more of the crops of corn, barley, oats, rye, and grain sorghums, the secretary may also require that producers participate in such program as a condition of eligibility for loans, purchases, and payments authorized by this section. Land diversion payments shall be made to a producer on a farm who devotes an acreage of cropland on the farm to conservation uses approved by the Secretary in accordance with a land diversion contract entered into with the Secretary. The amounts payable to a producer under a land diversion contract shall be determined by such means as the Secretary determines appropriate, including the submission of bids for such contracts. In determining the acceptability of a contract offer, the Secretary shall take into consideration the extent of the diversion to be undertaken by the producer and the productivity of the acreage diverted. The Secretary shall limit the total acreage to be diverted under agreements in any county or local community so as not to affect adversely the economy of the county or local community.

"(3) The reduced acreage and the diverted acreage may be devoted to wildlife food plots or wildlife habitat in conformity with standards established by the Secretary in consultation with wildlife agencies.

"(4) An operator of a farm desiring to participate in the program conducted under this subsection shall execute an agreement with the Secretary providing for such participation no later than such date as the Secretary may prescribe. The Secretary may, by mutual agreement with the producer, terminate or modify any such agreement entered into under this subsection if the Secretary determines such action necessary because of an emergency created by drought or other disaster or to prevent or alleviate a shortage in the supply of agricultural commodities.

By Mr. HEFLIN (for himself and Mr. DENTON):

S. 2034. A bill to designate the lock and dam known as the Jones Bluff Lock and Dam, located on the Alabama River, as the "Robert F. Henry Lock and Dam"; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

ROBERT F. HENRY LOCK AND DAM

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I introduce for myself and my distinguished colleague, Senator DENTON, a bill to rename the Jones Bluff Lock and Dam on the Alabama River in honor of the late Dr. Robert F. Henry of Montgomery, Ala., who died on August 14, 1981.

Dr. Henry was an outstanding Alabamian. He was a civic leader, churchman, and educator. He also served as president of Birmingham-Southern College. Although Dr. Henry served the people of his State and his Nation in many civic and charitable ways, he is better remembered for his yeoman efforts in behalf of the full and comprehensive development of the Coosa-Alabama River system.

The development of this mighty river system has been the quest of farsighted men such as Dr. Henry for many years. The improvement of the Coosa-Alabama River system for flood control, power production, navigation, and other purposes was authorized in 1945 and subsequently modified in the River and Harbor Act of 1954. In 1956, the moving force behind this proposal, namely, the Coosa-Alabama River Improvement Association, elected Dr. Henry as its president and Dr. Henry served continuously as the chief executive officer of the association until his death.

Funds for the construction of locks and dams on the river system did not come easy. As a matter of fact, it was not until 1961 that the first planning moneys were approved for the locks and dams. During this time Dr. Henry would head up large delegations of citizens in presenting the case for this river system before the Senate and House Appropriations Committees here in Washington. His leadership and persistence paid dividends. Today the Alabama River is fully developed for power production, flood control, and navigation. At the time of his death, Dr. Henry was working diligently in behalf of improving the Coosa River for navigation from Montgomery to Gadsden, Ala., thence to Rome, Ga.

One of the most imposing structures on the Coosa-Alabama is the Jones Bluff Lock and Dam on the Alabama River between Lowndes and Autauga Counties. It was one of the first projects targeted by Dr. Henry in his quest to develop the river system. The naming of this majestic dam in honor of Dr. Henry would be most fitting and appropriate recognition of his tireless efforts in behalf of the development of the river system, as well as his commitment to a bigger and better economic day for the citizens of his State.

Mr. President, I urge my distinguished colleagues to support this measure, and ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) the Jones Bluff Lock and Dam, located on the Alabama River between Lowndes and Autauga Counties, Alabama, is designated and shall hereafter be known as the "Robert F. Henry Lock and Dam".

(b) Any reference in a law, map, regulation, document, record, or other paper of the United States to that lock and dam shall be deemed to be a reference to the "Robert F. Henry Lock and Dam".

● Mr. DENTON. Mr. President, I rise to join my colleague, Senator HEFLIN, in paying tribute to Dr. Robert Filmore Henry by joining him to sponsor legislation to rename the Jones Bluff lock and dam as the Robert F. Henry Dam.

The Jones Bluff lock and dam, part of the Coosa-Alabama River system, is 30 miles west of Montgomery, Ala.

Robert F. Henry served as a leader of the Alabama-Coosa River Improvement Association from 1956 until his death last year.

Under Dr. Henry's leadership, the Coosa-Alabama River Improvement Association brought significant benefits to Alabama and the Southeast. In 1956 Dr. Henry was elected the first president of the association, and thereafter served continuously as the chief executive officer. In March 1981 he made his 25th consecutive annual trip to Washington to testify before the Senate and House Energy and Water Appropriations Committees in support of development of the Coosa-Alabama waterway.

Dr. Henry demonstrated that an individual can make a difference in this world. He had a dream and lived to see that dream fulfilled. His interest in the Coosa-Alabama began when he joined the Montgomery Chamber of Commerce as a young man. He worked hard for this community, the city of Montgomery. His peers honored his efforts by electing him president of the Montgomery Chamber of Commerce.

Dr. Henry also served as an honorary consul of Thailand.

Dr. Henry was a patriotic man, and a leading figure in the support of the citizens of Montgomery for the American Armed Forces. In 1963 the Department of the Army awarded him its Patriotic Civilian Service Award. He was an active participant in the sponsor program of the Air University's Foreign Officer School.

If he could be here today, Dr. Henry would want me to mention his family, to whom he was deeply devoted. He married Annie Mae Branch of Montgomery. His son, Robert F. Henry, Jr, now carries on the family business. His daughter, Anne Henry Tidemore, lives and operates her own business in Montgomery.

Those who served with Dr. Henry in Alabama also deserve mention. I would especially like to mention the citizens who served with Dr. Henry when he was a member of the board of directors of the Union Bank and Trust Co., the Alabama Gas Corp., and the Alagasco Energy Co.●

By Mr. HEFLIN:

S. 2035. A bill to establish a National Court of Appeals, and for other purposes; by unanimous consent, ordered held at the desk until the close of business on Tuesday, February 2, 1982.

NATIONAL COURT OF APPEALS ACT OF 1982

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, on July 29, 1981, I introduced Senate bill 1529, to establish a National Court of Appeals. At the November hearings on this measure in the Subcommittee on Courts, the need for this concept was reaffirmed by the witnesses.

Today I am introducing a bill which virtually embodies the provisions of S. 1529 and, additionally, provides for the appointment of a Chancellor to the United States to be Presiding Judge of the National Court of Appeals, a judge and administrator who will be directly responsible to the Chief Justice of the United States.

The establishment of the National Court of Appeals, headed by the Chancellor, will improve the administration of justice in America. This measure will give greatly needed and long delayed assistance to the Supreme Court so it can continue to fulfill its constitutional responsibility to the citizens of this country.

In the last several decades, we have witnessed a steady increase in the number of cases docketed with the Supreme Court. Recent statistics indicate that in the face of burgeoning litigation and increased reliance on the court system to resolve a vast array of disputes, there is little or no hope for relief in sight.

In its 1951 term, the Supreme Court had 1,353 cases on its docket. In the 1961 term, this number increased to 2,570, and by last term had reached 3,814. Also during last term, the Supreme Court received 4,242 petitions for writ of certiorari. The Court granted 289 certiorari, less than 7 percent; 107 of those granted were summarily decided and only 182 were scheduled for oral argument. Clearly, more than 6 or 7 percent of those cases "are crying out to be heard" but our highest Court has little choice.

Normally, 30 percent of the cases that come to the Court do so by way of State courts and 70 percent reach it from inferior Federal courts. The number of civil cases filed in the U.S. district courts more than doubled from 1960 to 1976. Furthermore, cases filed in the 11 U.S. courts of appeal increased from 4,823 in 1962, to 18,413 in 1976, an increase of more than 300 percent.

A National Court of Appeals will relieve the burden of the Supreme Court by resolving conflicts from the Federal circuits and thereby promote the uniformity that is imperative in our Federal court system. Such a court will clarify and stabilize the national law with a minimum amount of delay. Its decisions would constitute binding precedents on Federal and State courts regarding Federal questions unless modified or overruled by the Supreme Court.

The Supreme Court will be able to closely monitor and review the docket, the decisions, and the administration of the National Court of Appeals, and thereby continue to fulfill its obligations as the highest Court in the land.

The Supreme Court would be authorized to refer to the new court any case before it on petition for certiorari. The Supreme Court would direct the new court either to decide the case on the merits or to exercise its own discretion on whether to review the case. The Supreme Court could finally review any case in the National Court of Appeals by writ of certiorari.

The provision for a Chancellor appointed by the Chief Justice of the United States would give the Supreme Court control over the administration of the National Court of Appeals. The Chancellor would be appointed from judges serving on active duty as members of the U.S. circuit courts of appeals. The Chancellor would function both as the presiding judge and an administrator of the National Court of Appeals. The administration of the court would include establishing a pool of judges to serve on the National Court of Appeals, and selecting judges from this pool to serve either on a five-judge certiorari panel for determination of which cases the court will review, or on a five-judge reviewing panel for actual determining the merits of a case.

The Chancellor of the United States will serve another important function in our Federal judiciary. He will assist the Chief Justice with all of the Court's nonjudicial functions and administrative duties. This role is significant, for it will release the Chief Justice from many time-consuming administrative matters so he can concentrate more fully on the critical business of judicial responsibilities.

Mr. President, the creation of the National Court of Appeals is a necessary step toward resolving conflicts from Federal circuits and promoting the uniformity that is imperative in our Federal court system. The future of our democracy depends on resolving the problems which endanger the administration of justice.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I further ask unanimous consent that this bill be held at the desk pending determinations on whether or not it should be referred to the committee or whether it can be passed after we go through some exploration with the committee chairman, the minority members, and other members, pertaining to whether or not it should be passed.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the acting majority leader.

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be held at the desk until the close of business Tuesday as per the agreement with the majority leader.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered printed in the RECORD.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "National Court of Appeals Act of 1982".

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Senate shall transmit a copy of this resolution to Martin Leonard Skutnik III.

IN GRATITUDE TO LENNY SKUTNIK

● Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, I am submitting today, along with Senator DOMENICI, a Senate resolution commending Lenny Skutnik for his heroism in the aftermath of the tragic plane crash in Washington on January 13.

What he did was a single act of bravery that touched us all. It is certain that had he not dived into the river to rescue the floundering survivor, her name would have been added to those 78 who so tragically lost their lives.

All of us who saw that terrible drama on television will never forget it. Yet, mindful of the notion that "history is lived in the main by the unknown and forgotten," it is clear that even had Mr. Skutnik acted in some remote corner of the world far from the camera's eye, it would not have diminished the dignity and valor of what he did.

Lenny Skutnik is a modest man who has borne notoriety with grace and humility, fine virtues matching the daring and resolve he showed during the rescue. So, it is not out of some sense of reward, but rather in the spirit of gratitude that we offer this resolution commending Mr. Skutnik for his selfless valor and heroism in the face of extreme danger.

I welcome all Members of the Senate who join with me in saying a deserved thank you to Lenny Skutnik.●

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I am glad to join our colleagues in cosponsoring this Senate resolution commending Martin Leonard Skutnik III, for his actions on January 13.

In recent years, we have often been inundated with negative stories about people. In an otherwise jaundiced and jaded age, refreshing it is to hear of a man whose sense of duty and right is so instinctive that he put his own life in jeopardy to save a stranger in need.

Also refreshing it is to learn that Lenny Skutnik is a Congressional Budget Office employee. Too often, only the misdeeds of Federal or congressional employees catch media attention. Mr. Skutnik reminds us that thousands of public employees are decent, sensitive, and principled men and women of whom we can all be proud.

But, most important, perhaps, we are indebted to Leonard Skutnik not as a symbol or representative of something, but as a courageous man who has left us a vivid image of our responsibility to one another. No more eloquent answer was ever given to the question, "Am I my brother's keeper?"

I thank Lenny Skutnik for partially renewing our trust in our neighbors and our pride in ourselves.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

F. D. R.—A GIANT IN OUR HISTORY

● Mr. PELL. Mr. President is it with deep respect and affection that I join in paying tribute to President Franklin D. Roosevelt on this, the 100th anniversary of his birth.

President Roosevelt had a sense of purpose and a depth and breadth of vision which will accord him a place alongside George Washington and Abraham Lincoln as one of our greatest Presidents to date—three giants in our national history.

I remember when I was young being with my father and President Roosevelt, who was an old family friend and Dutchess County neighbor. In fact, among my most prized possessions are the various letters, personal and official, which my father received over the course of his lifetime from Franklin D. Roosevelt; in turn, all of my father's papers are on deposit in the F. D. R. Library in Hyde Park.

No matter how one knew President Roosevelt, one could not help be awed by his acuity and wisdom, and by the way he exercised authority. Among the qualities that gave him strength of character and a sense of purpose were the tradition from which he sprang and the standards that were expected of him. Accordingly, he could never understand why his old boyhood friends inveighed so against him charging that he was damaging our very national being and our economic and social system. President Roosevelt profoundly believed that he had saved America from some form of communism or totalitarianism through the very reforms which he introduced and championed.

He led us to success in our two greatest national crises in this century—from the black despair of the Depression to a new social order in which the strong were encouraged and the weak protected; from international isolation and the virtual absence of a credible national defense to the brink of victory in the most devastating war the world has ever seen—and, we hope, will ever see.

By teaching us that our greatest fear was fear itself, he gave us hope. By teaching us that economic deprivation and social injustice were not natural or inevitable, he laid the basis for the greatest outburst of productivity and achievement our society has ever known. And by teaching us that democracy could stand against totalitarian ideologies of the left or right and win, he gave us the confidence to play a leading role in shaping the postwar world and preserving the general peace. We, the beneficiaries of his leadership, shall be ever grateful. And we can most effectively honor his legacy by preserving the value of his accomplishments, by renewing the spirit of freshness, innovation and—yes, by sharing his commitment to public services.

With these observations, and with deep personal regard and humility, I join in celebrating this, his 100th birthday.●

FRANKLIN DELANO ROOSEVELT

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, undoubtedly many speeches will be given and celebrations held throughout the Nation this week to commemorate the 100th birthday of Franklin Delano Roosevelt. As a U.S. Senator from New York, the birthplace of F. D. R., it is a special honor to join my fellow Americans in paying tribute to a former New York State legislator, Governor of New York, Secretary of the Treasury and, of course, President of the United States.

Today, 37 years after his death, F. D. R. remains one of America's most-loved Presidents. Like his cousin Teddy, he was a strong political and moral leader who had a sense of history and direction. With these qualities, he was able to lead this Nation through the greatest depression it has ever known, and through a world war it will never forget.

F. D. R. was a man of the people and a man of the times, whose exuberance and ability to communicate a sense of hope and purpose to the American public were crucial to lifting the spirits of a nation burdened by perilous times. Added to this, were his more personal attributes, such as warmth, self-confidence, and zest for life. All of these qualities appealed to the mood of a troubled people.

Perhaps F. D. R.'s greatest contribution was his talent to instill this country with a sense of hope and purpose. On this day of remembrance, we would do well to recapture that spirit of hope and purpose. Today, we face difficult times, but certainly no more difficult than those faced by the 34th President of the United States.

I have said that F. D. R. was a man of the times; he was. He had the foresight and imagination, as well as the innovative ability, to know that there was a need for change in our country. At that time, he was able to seize upon the opportunities at hand to create an environment for the country to grow and prosper. Today, in another respect, we must do the same.

F. D. R. once said "this generation of Americans has a rendezvous with destiny." I believe that this is no less true today than when those words were spoken. Today, in order to meet the challenge of destiny, we must remember yet another of Roosevelt's observations; that "this country demands bold, persistent experimentation."

Mr. President, it is with true pride that I honor this great man.●

THE 64TH ANNIVERSARY OF UKRAINIAN INDEPENDENCE

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I should like to take this opportunity to remind all Senators of a special occasion important to all who appreciate freedom and the realization of fundamental human rights. This week marks the 64th anniversary of the creation of the independent Ukrainian National Republic, established on January 22, 1918, following the collapse of the Czarist Russian Empire. As Ukrainians the world over well know, the independence of their homeland in the 20th century was a short-lived event, for this people was soon after among the first to suffer the cruelties of Soviet domination. To this very day, the Soviet Union continues its dominance over Ukraine and its people, who must endure the bitter repression of the U.S.S.R.

Over the years, I have spoken out for Ukrainians who are unable to freely express their outrage and who must suffer at the hands of the Soviet Union. I have supported the Helsinki and Belgrade accords and have condemned those who would continuously defy those same agreements. Once again, I must express my outrage at the blatant Soviet misuse of such international treaties for the purpose of continuing their dominance over a people and a territory that should benefit from the same freedoms that all of us in the United States and Europe enjoy.

At present, Soviet authorities have sentenced and imprisoned 12 members of the Ukrainian Helsinki group and there appears to be no end in sight to the possibility of additional trumped up arrests. The following is a list of the 12 courageous members of the group who are imprisoned in the Soviet Union:

Oksana Meshko, Olha Heyko, Vasyl Stus, Vitaly Kalynychenko, Yaroslav Lesiv, Vyacheslav Chornovil, Ivan Kandyba, Zinovy Krasivsky, Mykola Horbal, Oles Berdnyk, Yuri Lytvyn, Petro Sichko.

It is particulary disheartening that while Ukrainians have not been able to realize their freedom after 64 years of Soviet rule, we now find Poland embroiled in its own fight for freedom. The leaders of Solidarity, like the imprisoned members of the Ukrainian-Helsinki group, are experiencing firsthand, the blatant violations of the Helsinki Final Act that the U.S.S.R. has consistently supported.

I believe it is of the utmost importance that the United States take a determined stand in support of the Polish people's quest for freedom and lend its further support for Solidarity's efforts in its fight to achieve a freer and more prosperous way of life for all Poles. I firmly support the actions already taken by the President and favor further efforts that could help assure the participation of our European allies in imposing sanctions and export controls on those who would tolerate violations of human rights.

In conclusion, I should like to express my firm support for those who work for those same freedoms that we in the United States find essential. I believe that through constant and unwavering support for Ukrainians, Poles, and all who seek to rid themselves of Soviet control, we may one day witness the end to dominance and harassment of people who seek their most fundamental right—freedom.●

LIBERATION OF BRIG. GEN. JAMES DOZIER

● Mr. DENTON. Mr. President, I want to express to my colleagues and to the American people my great sense of personal relief at the liberation, by the Italian Carabinieri and State Police, of Brig. Gen. James Lee Dozier. I am sure the entire Nation shares the joy of the general and his family. Given the demonstrated brutality of the Red Brigades, many of us privately feared, and some even publicly speculated, that this situation could only end in tragedy.

I believe we should note that the rescue of General Dozier was made possible by the professionalism and the dedication to duty of the Italian State Police. They, in my view, have been unjustly criticized in the past by the American press. They have been given little credit for their many noteworthy achievements in combating terrorism. We have read often of their alleged failures but rarely of their real successes.

The rescue is also a testimonial to the fundamental strength of NATO and the cooperative relations among its members. That ongoing cooperation and mutual support, not the press reports of transitory and ephemeral disagreement, truly distinguish the alliance. Now more than ever it is a vital factor in the survival of all its member states and peoples.

Despite reports that disagreement on tactics has riven the ranks of the Red Brigades, the organization remains menacing. By its actions it has declared war on the personnel of all NATO members, not just on Americans in Italy. We must be alert to its activities. We and our NATO partners should continue to encourage and assist the Italian Government to neutralize the threat.

We must also give close attention to the safety of our representatives abroad, civilian as well as military. The happy outcome of General Dozier's ordeal stands in marked contrast to the cowardly killing of Lt. Col. Charles Robert Ray in Paris on January 18, 1982, and to the assassination of 100 Americans overseas since 1968. In recent years, such attacks have increased in frequency, to the detriment of the effectiveness and morale of our military and civilian personnel in other countries. The situation threatens our ability to implement an effective foreign and national security policy. It demands our attention.

Mr. President, I hope my colleagues in this Chamber, and all Americans, will join me in a prayer of thanksgiving for the return to freedom of a loyal servant of our Nation, Brig. Gen. James Lee Dozier.●

A MORAL PERSPECTIVE ON THE ARMS RACE

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I recently came across an article by Rabbi Sidney Greenberg of Jenkintown, Pa., which, I believe, gives us a very useful moral perspective on the arms race. While not everyone, including myself, will agree with every judgment which is pronounced in the article, I do feel it is worth the attention of my colleagues. Therefore, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article by Rabbi Greenberg, entitled "As Did Babel of Old, Our Society Is Turning Morality on Its Head."

[From the Philadelphia Inquirer, Nov. 21, 1981]

As Did Babel of Old, Our Society Is Turning Morality on Its Head

(By Rabbi Sidney Greenberg)

Recently there was a court ruling that the use of home video recorders was against the law because the machines infringed on the copyrights of the producers of television programs. Moreover, according to the ruling, the manufacturers of these recorders and the stores that sold them could be sued for making them available to the consumer.

Shortly after the ruling was handed down, this newspaper published a caustic cartoon by Conrad. In the center was a large video recorder. In the lower right-hand corner was a handgun. At the base of the cartoon was this question: "On which item have the courts ruled that manufacturers and retailers be held responsible for having supplied the equipment?"

This is a question to give us painful pause. Video recorders are subject to greater control than handguns, which are used in 30 murders every 24 hours in America. The cartoon also accuses us of the cardinal irreverence—putting property rights above human rights, holding things dear and life cheap.

According to the ancient Jewish sages, this was precisely the sin of the builders of the biblical Tower of Babel. When one of the laborers fell from a scaffold to his death, no one paid attention. But when one of the bricks fell down and smashed, there was great weeping and wailing. They, too, held things dear and life cheap. It was this perversion of values that provoked God and caused Him to "confuse their tongues" and to "scatter them over the face of the whole earth."

Quite obviously, the sin of the tower builders did not die with them. It is alive and doing its mischief among us. At least that's the way it appears to this observer. And it is not only the video recorders and the handguns that I am thinking of.

What is one to think about the neutron bomb? Its very function strikes me as being obscene. It kills people but leaves buildings intact. I suppose that bombs are not to be faulted for lacking a sense of moral discrimination, but there is something inherently perverse in a bomb that respects property and demolishes people. Is this not the ultimate assault upon human dignity?

And what are we to make of this dreary statistic? The United States and the Soviet Union each has the equivalent of 30,000 pounds of TNT for every man, woman and child on the face of this earth! The only commodity available in such chilling abundance is the power to obliterate life.

We do not have in reserve 30,000 pounds of food, clothing, medicine or books for every human being. In 1960, there was a reserve stock of food grain sufficient for 102 days of world consumption; in 1980, there was enough only for 40 days.

Despite this ominous disparity between our expanding capacity to destroy life and our shrinking capacity to sustain it, we are now contemplating massive increases in appropriations for weapons of destruction and equally massive decreases in appropriations for human services.

It has been proposed that we increase defense spending next year to $220 billion. Over the next five years $1.5 trillion will be put at the Pentagon's disposal.

These staggering sums will require painful cutbacks in old people's pensions and poor children's lunches. Food stamps to the needy will be drastically reduced. There will be less money available for education, child welfare, foster care, adoption assistance. Other programs to be victimized include alcohol and drug rehabilitation, health care, aid to the handicapped, legal aid to those who cannot afford to pay. The frigid breath of economy will also be felt by the arts and humanities, by parks, museums, opera, symphony orchestras, public television and radio.

In brief, all the proud hallmarks of a humane and civilized society will be offered on the altar of the illusory goal of military supremacy.

The words of the poet Lilith Lorraine seem to be pointing accusingly, directly at us:

When planes outsoar the spirits, flying blind,
When ships outsail the dreams that gave them birth,
When towers dwarf the upward reaching mind,
When wealth is mightier than simple worth—
We almost hear the turning of a page,
We almost know what every seraph knows,
That somewhere on a universal stage,
A tiresome play is drawing to its close.

It is not too late to re-examine our basic values and priorities. The drama of American democracy need not be "a tiresome play drawing to its close." It can be a continuing story of expanding human horizons, and deepening commitments to the true sources of our country's vigor and glory.●

POLAND: THE COMPLEX AND THE SIMPLE

● Mr. PELL. Mr. President, today the nations of the West face an immensely complicated challenge in shaping a sound policy toward Poland, and toward the Soviet Union for its role in Poland's tragedy. The problem is both political and economic. Poland's political future is deeply dependent on its economic progress, and its economic prospects in turn depend heavily on its trade and credit relationship with the Western industrial democracies. The task for Western policy therefore is to shape that relationship so as to create effective pressure toward economic reform and political liberalization.

Yesterday, in hearings before the Foreign Relations Committee, Administration witnesses underscored the complexities facing the Western nations in devising this policy. On practical economic grounds—and for moral and political reasons relating to the repression in Poland—we cannot continue the past policy of easy lending and debt rescheduling. On the other hand, to declare summarily that Poland is in default would be likely to achieve little more than turmoil in our own Western financial markets and increased Soviet influence on Polish government policies. What we require is a policy on the middle road—one which creates stiff but practical conditions for the provision of further Western assistance aimed at alleviating the hardship being suffered by the Polish people.

Our first objective must be the lifting of martial law and a resumption of negotiations involving Polish authorities and representatives of the Solidarity Trade Union and the Catholic Church. If that hurdle can be crossed, we will then face the arduous task of conducting a long-term policy which will help bring to an end the preposterous disequilibrium by which Poland's current hard-currency debt service requirements are each year nearly double the entire sum of its export earnings.

In the meantime, we face a task far less complex—one indeed profound in its simplicity. It is to speak clearly and forcefully, and with as much unanimity as the West can muster, that Polish repression is an outrage against the principles of human rights and against the conscience of the world. It is for this purpose that the film "Let Poland be Poland" has been created by the International Communication Agency: to make a dramatic presentation to international audiences of Poland's tragic plight. Since the film is still unfinished, we cannot yet appraise its artistic or inspirational success. But trusting that it will be competently crafted to help galvanize world opinion, I am pleased to join in supporting the join resolution that will permit its presentation to American television audiences on January 31, the day when the film will first be broadcast overseas. Let us hope that its call for an end to tyranny will be heard not only by our allies, but also by the Polish and Soviet authorities who have created this crisis for East-West relations and for human hope.●

UKRAINIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

● Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, on January 22, 1982, the Ukrainian-American community marked the 64th anniversary of the proclamation of a free and sovereign Ukrainian Republic. Ukraine, of course, is not independent today despite the fact that the government of Soviet Russia recognized the Ukrainian National Republic at its inception.

The last 64 years have not been happy ones for the people of Ukraine. In 1920, The Ukrainian Republic was brutally overrun by Trotsky's Red army. In the 1930's, Millions of Ukrainians lost their lives under the Stalin regime. Millions more were sent to slave labor camps in Siberia. During World War II, The Ukrainian insurgent army bravely struggled against both Hitler and Stalin. After the war, this guerrilla army continued its fight for Ukrainian independence until the early 1950's, when it was finally eliminated by the Soviet Union.

The repressions continue to this day. Ukrainian culture, history, and traditions are suppressed. The Kremlin's callous policy of Russification represents a further attempt to destroy the National consciousness of the Ukrainian people. Similarly, their religious beliefs are under constant attack as a result of the atheistic policies of the Soviet regime. Basic Human Rights are flouted on a daily basis.

Despite these attacks on the spirit and the dignity of the Ukrainian people, the struggle continues. Thousands of Ukrainian patriots, many of them incarcerated in Soviet labor camps, prisons, or special psychiatric hospitals, continue to speak out in behalf of an independent Ukraine.

UKRAINIAN HELSINKI GROUP

In August of 1975, the Helsinki Final Act was signed by the United States, Canada, and 33 European nations, including the Soviet Union. The human rights provisions of the Final Act became a rallying symbol for Ukrainians struggling for their basic human rights. In November of 1977, a number of courageous individuals led by Mykola Rudenko, formed the Ukrainian Public Group for the implementation of the Helsinki accords, whose aim was to draw attention to the Soviet Union's lack of compliance with these provisions which are guaranteed by the Final Act. Members of the Ukrainian Helsinki Group have been persecuted to an unprecedented degree. Not one of these courageous people has escaped harsh repressions. The majority find themselves behind prison walls or barbed wire, yet they continue to speak out in defense of human rights, and consistently call on the Soviet leadership to observe the Helsinki Final Act.

We must not forget the outstanding men and women who joined the Ukrainian Helsinki monitoring group. Neither must we forget the thousands of other nameless men and women languishing in prisons, nor the millions denied their fundamental dignity as human beings. For our part, we must steadfastly continue to remind the Soviets of their blatant violations of the Helsinki Final Act.

While the Ukrainian people are struggling for adherence to principles of human rights that are now internationally recognized and accepted, they are also struggling for the survival of their culture and national heritage. We must not forget them in their quest for freedom, for to do so would be to forget our principles and our precious heritage of freedom.●

TRADE LAW REFORM NEEDED

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, the Trade Subcommittee of the House Ways and Means Committee for a number of weeks last year conducted extensive oversight hearings on trade policy.

One of the most thoughtful and well-reasoned statements to be presented at those hearings came from Richard O. Cunningham of Steptoe & Johnson, one of Washington's leading trade law practitioners. Mr. Cunningham's opening remarks are notable for their clear articulation of principles that should govern our trade law enforcement:

There are two principles underlying the testimony which I will be giving today. First, I feel strongly that the Antidumping and Countervailing Duty Laws are important and deserve to be enforced fairly and effectively. Under our capitalist, free-market system, we tell our businesses that they will succeed if they are efficient and productive. This necessarily implies that there are rules of fair conduct in the business world which, if followed, produce that result. If we are to have strong industries and productive workers in this country, we must be able to assure them that they will not be deprived of the benefits of their efficiency and productivity by losing out to dumped or subsidized foreign import competition. My basic premise, therefore, is that these laws are important enough for us to devote the resources necessary to effective enforcement.

The second basic principle in my philosophy of trade law enforcement is that the trade laws should operate clearly, objectively and non-politically. Rules of conduct should be established which are understandable and which can be administered effectively. A foreign exporter should be able to understand how to price its products fairly in the U.S. market. A foreign government should be able to understand what practices constitute countervailing subsidies and what practices do not. A U.S. producer should be able to make a judgment as to whether it should or should not bring a trade law proceeding. Finally, and most important, the result of a proceeding should be determined by the objective application of the statutory criteria to the facts, and not by political or diplomatic influences.

These are precisely the objectives I have been working for, and I am pleased that Mr. Cunningham noted the progress in that direction that the Trade Agreements Act of 1979 represents. This was legislation many of us on the Finance Committee spent considerable hours developing.

I invite the attention of Senators to Mr. Cunningham's comments regarding our laws dealing with unfair trade practices by nonmarket economies. His testimony points out the clear inadequacies of present law and details the improvements that would be made by my legislation, S. 958. Hearings will be held on this bill on January 29, and I hope rapid action will follow.

Mr. President, anyone who follows trade law issues closely should read Mr. Cunningham's excellent statement. I ask that it appear at this point in the RECORD.

The statement follows:

STATEMENT OF RICHARD O. CUNNINGHAM

TOPICAL OUTLINE OF STATEMENT OF RICHARD O. CUNNINGHAM

Witness: Richard O. Cunningham.

Address: 1250 Connecticut Avenue, N.W., Washington, D.C.

Title: Member of the Law Firm of Steptoe & Johnson.

Representing: The views presented by Mr. Cunningham are entirely his own, and do not necessarily represent the views of either Steptoe & Johnson or any client of the firm.

Purpose of Statement: To suggest certain measures needed to improve the enforcement of the U.S. trade laws, especially the Antidumping and Countervailing Duty Laws.

Problem: The Commerce Department does not have adequate personnel to handle the demands which the Antidumping and Countervailing Duty Laws are now putting on that agency. This problem is likely to become much more acute in 1982, when a substantial increase in the volume of trade cases—not just in steel, but across the board—can be anticipated.

Proposed Remedies: (1) A substantial increase—on the order of 40 percent to 50 percent—in the staff of the Department's Import Administration; (2) Repeal of provisions in current law which permit interlocutory appeals of Commerce Department determinations other than final determinations.

Problem: The Commerce Department today follows a rule, inherited from the Treasury Department, that prevents it from imposing antidumping duties upon an imported product which is sold with another product for a single, lump-sum price. This is enabling foreign exporters to evade dumping findings simply by selling the dumped product and another product together for a single, lump-sum price.

Proposed Remedy: Amendment of Section 771 of the Antidumping Law to require the Department to determine the portion of a lump-sum price allocable to the dumped product.

Problem: Application of the trade laws to imports from non-market economy countries is currently irrational, unpredictable and unworkable.

Proposed Remedy: Enactment of S. 958 or similar legislation, establishing a clear standard of pricing for non-market economy imports.

STATEMENT OF RICHARD O. CUNNINGHAM

My name is Richard O. Cunningham. I am a member of the law firm of Steptoe & Johnson. I have been engaged in the practice of international trade law for more than a dozen years. I am grateful for the opportunity to appear here today at the invitation of the Subcommittee staff, and I want to emphasize that my testimony reflects views which are entirely my own. I am not appearing today on behalf of my firm or of any client of the firm.

There are two principles underlying the testimony which I will be giving today. First, I feel strongly that the Antidumping and Countervailing Duty Laws are important and deserve to be enforced fairly effectively. Under our capitalist, free-market system, we tell our businesses that they will succeed if they are efficient and productive. This necessarily implies that there are rules of fair conduct in the business world which, if followed, produce that result. If we are to have strong industries and productive workers in this country, we must be able to assure them that they will not be deprived of the benefits of their efficiency and productivity by losing out to dumped or subsidized foreign import competition. My basic premise, therefore, is that these laws are important enough for us to devote the resources necessary to effective enforcement.

The second basic principle in my philosophy of trade law enforcement is that the trade laws should operate clearly, objectively and non-politically. Rules of conduct should be established which are understandable and which can be administered effectively. A foreign exporter should be able to understand how to price its products fairly in the U.S. market. A foreign government should be able to understand what practices constitute countervailable subsidies and what practices do not. A U.S. producer should be able to make a judgment as to whether it should or should not bring a trade law proceeding. Finally, and most important, the result of a proceeding should be determined by the objective application of the statutory criteria to the facts, and not by political or diplomatic influences.

The past two years have seen very substantial improvements, in my view, in the enforcement of the Antidumping and Countervailing Duty Laws. The Trade Agreements Act went a long way toward clarifying and objectifying the standards, especially in the countervailing duty area. The Commerce Department has, in my judgment, proven to be a more vigorous and effective enforcer of the laws than was the Treasury Department. In particular, the investigative procedures which the Department has adopted—verification by investigative teams in all cases, increased use of accounting expertise, and a more effective administrative organization—have made substantial strides toward what I regard as the right way to enforce these laws.

There remain, however, a number of trouble spots. I propose to touch on three of them today.

A. THE NEED FOR AN INCREASE IN THE COMMERCE DEPARTMENT STAFF

Every time I have appeared before this Subcommittee over the past several years, I have urged that the resources devoted to enforcement of the Antidumping and Countervailing Duty Laws be increased—more funding, more personnel. I was therefore pleased with the increases in both personnel and funding which have occurred since the assumption of responsibilities by the Department of Commerce. Indeed, I have some hesitancy in calling once again for further increases, especially in view of the budget constraints under which all Federal departments must now operate. Unfortunately, I see serious troubles ahead if the staff of the Import Administration is not substantially increased. I say this for several reasons:

First, the increased resources devoted by the Commerce Department to enforcement of these laws have been at least fully offset by the much greater administrative demands of the 1979 legislation. In particular, the proliferation of interlocutory appeals and the much greater than expected workload of Section 751 review proceedings is already straining the Department's resources to the limit.

This strain is occurring, moreover, despite the fact that there have not been very many new antidumping or countervailing duty cases filed in the past eighteen months. Certainly, compared with the 1977-78 period, the influx of new cases has been relatively modest. What the Department has found, however, is that the annual reviews under Section 751 are almost as time-consuming as full-scale antidumping or countervailing duty investigations. That is as it should be, because now U.S. industries are able to contest arguments which under the old system were raised by the foreign exporters and decided by the Treasury Department in essentially ex parte procedures. Nevertheless, this has meant that such reviews have taken a large and increasing portion of the Import Administration's manpower.

The Department has been lucky so far, in terms of the absence of large-scale new case filings. That is about to change, for several reasons:

1. Downturns in the economic cycle normally lead—with some lag time—to a substantial increase in filings of antidumping and countervailing duty proceedings.

2. In this economic cycle, we can anticipate an especially large number of countervailing duty cases, owing both to foreign governments' increasing subsidization of their exporting industries and to the fact that the domestic subsidy provisions of the 1979 Act make more of those subsidies subject to countervailing duties.

3. Finally, there is of course the new round of steel cases.

On top of all this, the Subcommittee must keep in constant focus the fact that the number of Section 751 annual reviews keeps expanding continuously, Indeed, this round of new antidumping and countervailing duty cases will create a new and broader layer of annual reviews which will have to be conducted year after year in the future.

In short, we are rapidly approaching a staffing crisis at the Import Administration. When that crisis comes, the losers are likely to be the U.S. petitioners in many cases. I can tell you, based upon more than a decade of practice in this area, that thorough investigations benefit the petitioner in 90 percent of the cases, and inadequate investigations normally lead to negative determinations or to under-assessment of duties. I therefore strongly urge that two steps be taken.

First, the staff of the Import Administration should be increased substantially, on the order of 40 percent-50 percent. I realize the budgetary problems, but such an increase is absolutely essential if the Department is to enforce these laws effectively. Moreover, a significant part of the cost of this staffing increase is likely to be offset by increases in the amount of antidumping and countervailing duties collected through more thorough investigations.

Second, I would urge the repeal of all provisions authorizing review of interlocutory Commerce Department determinations. To date, such appeals have not been productive. Their principal impact has been to place severe burdens on the staff of the Import Administration—in the form of preparing the administrative record for court proceedings, working with counsel, appearing as witnesses, etc. It would be much more efficient to reserve all appealable issues for a court contest after the Department's final determination. If necessary, a provision could be adopted pursuant to which the International Trade Commission would stay its injury proceedings pending the outcome of an appeal of a final Commerce determination.

B. CONGRESS SHOULD CLOSE A MAJOR LOOPHOLE IN THE ANTIDUMPING LAW, BY MAKING IT CLEAR THAT A DUMPING FINDING CANNOT BE EVADED BY SELLING THE DUMPED PRODUCT IN CONJUNCTION WITH ANOTHER PRODUCT FOR A SINGLE, LUMP-SUM PRICE

In the context of the current Section 751 annual review of the antidumping finding in Large Power Transformers from Japan, the Commerce Department has to date failed to close a major loophole in the Antidumping Law which it inherited as a result of a 1977 ruling by the Treasury Department. In essence, the Department is permitting the Japanese exporters to evade the antidumping finding, simply by selling large power transformers to U.S. customers in conjunction with another type of electrical equipment for a single, lump-sum price. The loophole thus created is of immense potential significance, and should be closed immediately.

Let me give you a brief history of this issue, based upon my experience as counsel for Westinghouse Electric Corporation, the petitioner in the Large Power Transformer cases. Large power transformers are never used in isolation. Rather they are used in conjunction with such other electrical equipment as generators, rectifiers, substations, and the like. In many cases, it is equally convenient for an electric utility to purchase each piece of equipment either separately or as a package with other pieces of equipment. During the original antidumping investigation in the early 1970s, the Japanese exporters tried to exclude from the scope of the case what they referred to as "rectiformer". As it turned out, a "rectiformer" was simply a larger power transformer sold in conjunction with a rectifier. Westinghouse was able to demonstrate that, even where the rectifier and transformer were sold together for a single, lump-sum price, any competent electrical engineer could accurately allocate that overall price between the rectifier and the transformer. The Treasury Department therefore ruled against the Japanese, holding that transformers sold with rectifiers were properly included in the dumping investigation and would be subject to any finding of dumping.

More than five years later, the Japanese raised the issue again in connection with assessment of duties under the antidumping finding. By this time, there was a new—and, in my view, much more importer-oriented—regime at the Treasury Department. Once again, Westinghouse submitted proof that the price of the transformer can be accurately ascertained even when the transformer and rectifier are sold together for a single, lump-sum price. To our alarm, Treasury reversed itself and ruled in favor of the Japanese. This was not because our evidence was inadequate. To the contrary, Treasury (and Commerce today) does not deny that these transformers are properly classifiable in the "class or kind of merchandise" as other large power transformers. Nor do they dispute that the price for the transformer can be accurately ascertained by an electrical engineer in a lump-sum pricing situation. Rather, the Treasury position—which apparently remains the Commerce Department position today—was that the Antidumping Law forbids as a matter of law the imposition of dumping duties on a product which is sold in conjunction with a non-dumped product for a single, lump-sum price. In other words, no matter how readily the price of the dumped product may be separated from the price of the other product, the current administrative interpretation is that it is forbidden as a matter of law to make any such separation of the lump-sum price into its components.

The impact of this ruling has been just what one would expect. It has been easy for the Japanese exporters to persuade U.S. purchasers to allow them to quote a single price covering the rectifier and the transformer together. After all, it is in the purchaser's interest to obtain a lower overall price, even if it is a dumped price for the transformer portion. Accordingly, low-priced imports have now taken over half of the U.S. market for transformers used in conjunction with rectifiers. Under the current rule applied by the Commerce Department, there is nothing we can do about this.

Even more ominous is recent evidence that other foreign suppliers of electrical equipment have caught on to this loophole, and that they are trying to extend it to equipment combinations other than rectifiers and transformers. European producers, for example, are beginning to quote prices for complete substations or power plants—including dumped transformers—in an effort to utilize the loophole created by the "rectiformer" decision.

I think you will agree with me that this interpretation of the Antidumping Law creates a literally huge loophole. All that any foreign exporter need do to escape the impact of a dumping finding as to product X is to sell product X and product Y together for a single price. In a procurement situation, the U.S. purchaser will naturally be eager to cooperate by buying two products at the same time, because it may mean a substantial savings to him by taking advantage of the dumped price for one of the components. But this loophole would also be readily applicable to many consumer items. Suppose, for example, that the Department of Commerce has found that fishing reels have been dumped. The foreign manufacturer could easily avoid that finding by selling reels and rods together for a single, lump-sum price.

This loophole simply has to be closed. I urge this Committee to amend the Antidumping Law by adding the following new subsection (18) to Section 771 of the Trade Agreements Act of 1979:

(18) Merchandise Sold in Combination.—Where merchandise of a class or kind as to which the administering authority has made public an antidumping duty order as provided for in Section 736(a) is imported in conjunction with, in assembly with or accompanied by other merchandise, and where no separate price is charged for the merchandise covered by the antidumping duty order, the administering authority shall determine the portion of the import price properly allocable to the merchandise covered by the antidumping duty order, unless the administering authority determines that it is not possible to make such an allocation.

The phrase "not possible" has been selected deliberately, in preference to such alternatives as "not practical" or "not feasible", in order to make it clear that ingenious or complex combinations of merchandise will not be effective as a means of evading the Antidumping Law.

C. INADEQUACY OF LAWS DEALING WITH IMPORTS FROM NON-MARKET ECONOMY COUNTRIES

No rational observer could be satisfied with the current state of U.S. trade laws dealing with imports from non-market economies. Such imports of course, present major potential problems, stemming from the fact that their system simply does not mesh well with ours. As a consequence, imports from non-market countries may be priced at levels which do not reflect what a free market producer would regard as economic reality.

Despite the obvious potential problems posed by such imports, our present laws are totally inadequate and, indeed, arguably worsen the situation. The briefest summary of the present situation makes clear the inadequacy of current legislation:

Countervailing Duties. Totally inapplicable. The Commerce Department takes the position that the Countervailing Duty Law cannot be meaningfully applied to imports from non-market economies.

Antidumping. Applicable to non-market imports, but totally unpredictable and subject to diplomatic and political vagaries. In most cases, the result of the case depends on which "surrogate producer" is chosen. Where no surrogate producer is available, Commerce embarks upon a bizarre exercise of constructing what it would cost to manufacture the merchandise in question in an imaginary plant located in a country where such merchandise is not produced. Whatever method is used, the Commerce Department can literally reach any result which it desires in any given case.

Section 406. This provision has proved totally ineffective. No one has ever obtained relief. My experience in the Russian Ammonia case convinced me that the result of any proceeding has nothing whatsoever to do with injury, economic facts or anything set forth in the statute, but rather that political and diplomatic factors override all other considerations.

This is simply not the way to run trade policy, much less to establish rules governing the conduct of non-market sellers in the United States. Exporters in non-market economies can have no idea whatsoever as to when and under what circumstances their sales may be subject to attack under any of these laws. Similarly, U.S. industries aggrieved by such imports can make no realistic judgment as to whether a case which they might bring would have any prospect of obtaining relief. In short, it is time for a change.

I support the general principles underlying the Heinz bill (S. 958), which would create a pricing standard for non-market economy imports which would be clear and realistically enforceable. Under that proposal, a standard of "artificial pricing" would be created, which would require a non-market economy exporter to sell in the United States at a price no lower than the lowest price charged by importers of free-market merchandise. This is not only a clear standard. It is, in my judgment, a fair standard. Let me deal briefly with what I understand to be objections which have been raised to the Heinz proposal:

On the one hand, I understand that some U.S. industries have argued that this standard is too lenient. They point out that a producer in a non-market economy may not be as efficient as a producer in some free-market country, and should thus be held to a higher pricing standard. To me, this is mere theorizing. The very nature of costs in a non-market economy is such that we will simply never know whether a given producer is more or less efficient than a free market producer. Under such circumstances, the legislation gives non-market producers the "benefit of the doubt", but does so in such a way that U.S. industries are adequately protected. If other imports—from market economy countries—are sold in the United States at prices at least as low as those charged by the non-market economy seller, it seems to me that it would be difficult to argue that the non-market imports are depressing the U.S. price level. Indeed, a trade action brought against the non-market producer would still leave the equally-low-priced free market imports as a factor causing at least as much injury in the marketplace.

I have also heard representatives of U.S. producers argue that the Heinz bill would not deal with the threat of sudden surges of imports from non-market economy countries. Once again, I disagree. Procedures under S. 958 would be the same as those under the Antidumping and Countervailing Duty Laws. Those procedures include a provision for invoking early and retroactive relief upon a determination of "critical circumstances". This is, in my thinking, sufficient protection against surges from non-market countries. I might add that I have great difficulty in pointing to any case in which a "surge" of this nature was a factor in a non-market import proceeding. It is my strong view that pricing—not surges in volume—is the real problem with imports from non-market producers.

Finally, I have heard representatives of non-market economies complain that S. 958 is too restrictive, because it does not take into account the possibility that a non-market economy may genuinely be more efficient and have lower costs than producers in free market countries. This argument does not impress me. As I indicated before, I do not believe that we will ever be able to find out whether any given non-market economy producer is more or less efficient than a competitor is a free market country. Even if one were to analyze the "factors of production" (degree of automation, number of hours of labor per unit, amount of raw materials per unit of production, etc.) as contemplated by the Commerce Department's current phantasmagorical "constructed value" approach, I am convinced that we get no meaningful answers. Where the non-market economy producer is highly automated, it may well be that the State has decreed an artificially high level of automation in order to achieve some political goal. If the same enterprise were located in a free-market country and if the State had artificially supported the investment needed to obtain the high degree of automation, we would undoubtedly impose countervailing duties to offset the assistance from the State. The only reason we do not do precisely the same thing in the case of non-market economy imports is that the State controls all aspects of the economy, thus making application of the Countervailing Duty Law impractical. In short, the question whether a non-market producer is more efficient is an unanswerable question. And if that is more efficient, it may be the result of subsidies. Thus, I have no qualms whatsoever that S. 958 may be overly restrictive. For us to accord to non-market imports the presumption that they are at least as low in cost as the lowest-cost free-market imports is an eminently liberal trade policy.

I therefore urge this Subcommittee to support the basic approach set forth in S. 958. Action now is important, in view of the growth over the past several years in trade with non-market countries, and the concomitant increase in the number of potential dislocations caused by imports from those countries. I firmly believe that we should not discourage trade with the Socialist world. However, I believe that such trade should be conditioned on their adhering to pricing standards which (although liberal) do not place U.S. producers in a position of being unable to compete.

I wish to thank the Subcommittee for giving me the opportunity to present these views. I would be happy to answer any questions on these or other subjects.●

THE REPEAL OF ENERGY TAX INCENTIVES WOULD ONLY STRENGTHEN OPEC'S HAND

(Mr. GLICKMAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Speaker, the Treasury Department has announced that it will be submitting legislation to repeal energy tax credits as one way of raising revenues. That plays into the hands of OPEC and ignores the implications of our energy dependence on our economy and our national security. It also destroys consistency and certainty that is badly needed if these new industries are going to make a go of it.

The President made clear that he will be submitting a plan for dismemberment of the Department of Energy very shortly, and, in the meantime, the Department's budget calls for virtual inaction on the part of the Federal Government in the area of alternative energy and conservation. Repeal of the tax incentives intended to encourage the private sector to move into production and development of alternatives: alcohol, methane, solar, wind, geothermal, oil from shale, and coal technologies, to name just a few, is just one more step toward going back to the old way of meeting our energy needs. Laissez-faire wasn't enough before, and it won't be now. Too much is at stake here for the Government to say "it is not our problem."

A year ago this week, Sheik Yamani, the Saudi oil minister, made it clear that his government's strategy was to keep us from pursuing alternative energy sources and conservation policies. He made the point that inaction on our part would hasten the day of OPEC's ultimate stranglehold on us:

Saudi Arabia's interest may appear to be served by lower production rates and higher prices, irrespective of the outcome. Let me remind you of my earlier statements regarding the link between price and consumption rates. Whenever prices go down, consumption goes up and vice versa. Whenever oil prices increase, large amounts of capital are invested in search of alternative sources of energy and in a search for oil in different areas. If we force Western countries to invest heavily in finding alternative sources of energy, they will. This would take no more than 7 to 10 years and would result in reducing dependence on oil as a source of energy to a point which will jeopardize Saudi Arabia's interests. Saudi Arabia will then be unable to find markets to sell enough oil to meet its financial requirements. This picture should be understood.

Let us not play into their hands.

A TRIBUTE TO U.S. AIR FORCE THUNDERBIRDS KILLED IN ACCIDENT

(Mr. DAN DANIEL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. DAN DANIEL. Mr. Speaker, on Monday of last week, this Nation was sorely diminished with the deaths of Maj. Norman L. Lowry III, Capt. "Willy" Mays, Capt. Joseph N. "Pete" Peterson, and Capt. Mark E. Melancon, all U.S. Air Force Thunderbirds.

No man's passing should be without note but it does not detract from others that these four men should be especially mourned.

I was at Nellis Air Force Base along with Nevada's U.S. Senators, the Honorable HOWARD W. CANNON and the Honorable PAUL LAXALT, Maj. Gen. Guy L. Hecker, Jr., Director, Air Force Legislative Liaison, and Maj. Gen. Ralph J. Maglione, now retired, but formerly a Thunderbird leader, when a stirring and dignified memorial service was conducted. Prior to that ceremony, the Secretary of the Air Force advised me that messages of condolence had been pouring in from all over the world. Within the hour, he has received messages from the Governments of Great Britain and Turkey. The loss was truly felt on an international scale. A representative of the President called to say that the President was saddened by the tragedy and would make his sentiments known to the families of the men. Nor were the tributes limited only to words. Almost within hours the Blue Angels, the Navy counterpart to the Thunderbirds, had begun a scholarship fund for the six sons and daughters these men left behind and the University of Nevada established full scholarships for the wives and children.

It has also been felt on a personal level by many Americans. A considerable number of people in my district in the days immediately following this tragedy told me they had seen the Thunderbirds perform, sometimes noting they had met them, and in varying ways indicated they too felt a loss.

Even though Congress was not in session when this happened, it did not go unnoticed by our colleagues. Chairman MELVIN PRICE of the Committee on Armed Services wired a special message for the service:

On behalf of all of the members of the House Armed Services Committee, I want to express my deepest sympathy to the families of the officers of the Thunderbird program who were killed on January 18, 1982, in a tragic crash.

The Air Force personnel in the Thunderbird program provide an important link between the civilian and Air Force communities as representatives of all Air Force personnel who perform the demanding and dangerous tasks necessary for the defense of the Nation. The importance of the Thunderbird program cannot be overestimated, as it extends throughout the country an appreciation of the role of air power in our military readiness posture, as well as the remarkable skills required of Air Force personnel.

● This "bullet" symbol identifies statements or insertions which are not spoken by the Member on the floor.

These fine officers—Major Norman L. Lowry III, Captain Joseph N. "Pete" Peterson, Captain William "Willy" Mays, and Captain Mark E. Melancon—have given their lives in defense of the Nation as much as servicemen killed in combat. I salute them.

As might have been expected, once the shock of this sad event was passed, there immediately came from some quarters demands that the program be halted. While I do not argue with the good intentions of those who suggest this, it must be recognized that this is the last possible thing these four brave men would want. The thought was echoed by their widows, Mrs. Linda Downing Lowry, Mrs. Sara Ann Scragg Mays, Mrs. Cecilia Jones Peterson, and Mrs. Carol Jean Neal Melancon with whom I spoke. These women recognize the value to the Air Force and the country of their husbands' work and ultimate sacrifice. The Thunderbirds were all well aware that they were at risk when they took to the skies and while their attitude toward death was not cavalier, it was plain they felt their mission of greater importance than their personal risk.

What a breach of faith it would be were we to act in a manner contrary to their wishes because of this loss.

We Earth-bound mortals stand in awe of those who challenge the sky with such elan. They see the world in ways we never could. Not just physically, although that would be enough for most of us. They know a unity of man and machine, Earth and sky, reserved to them alone.

Most of us, if we fly at all, lumber along in airborne beasts of burden. The Thunderbirds master the skies like some well-blooded stallion. We envy them in a way not at all negative and we vicariously slip "the surly bonds of earth." It is somehow enough for us to know that others of our breed can do these things.

Not fly again? Those bold and daring men whom we call flyers look every day into the void which awaits us all. None of them does this thing because it is a job; it is a way of life, a very life itself. And even those who do not dare so gloriously would be lessened by this loss. These four brave men have given their lives in service to their Nation as surely as countless unnamed flyers who defended and made safe the skies of Europe and of Asia in an earlier time.

If their sacrifice has any meaning at all, it is because there are certain values, certain principles, certain eternal truths more precious than life itself. It is these truths, these principles, these values that these men were trained to defend and which they exemplified each day they lived.

Those who have died for their country can fail only to the extent that we, the living, fail them. They gave their all; we can do no less than to give our best. For if we fail them, we fail our country. We desecrate our heritage and we betray posterity.

So let us strive to measure up to the same degree of dedication, patriotism, and bravery these men have placed before us in their lives and their deaths.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GLICKMAN). The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Washington (Mr. FOLEY) for 1 minute.

CONGRATULATIONS TO ITALIAN GOVERNMENT IN RESCUE OF GEN. JAMES DOZIER

(Mr. FOLEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, we cannot allow the session to end before the Members of this body have had an opportunity to express our country's deep gratitude to the Italian people and Government and to their brave, effective security, and police forces for their relentless effort to rescue Gen. James Dozier. Their extraordinary success yesterday not only represents a stunning triumph of law over the forces of terrorism and ignorance but sent a thrill throughout the United States and the free world.

JOBS SERVICES OFFICES TO CLOSE

(Mr. YATES asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday, I filed a bill to provide $210 million for administrative expenses for the jobs services offices throughout the country. They are threatened with closing at a time when more than 9 million people are unemployed.

I want to commend the Speaker and the majority leader, the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. NATCHER) and the gentleman from Mississippi (Mr. WHITTEN), for taking immediate action to set that bill down for a hearing. Hearings are to be held on that bill on Tuesday, together with a hearing as well on providing an additional $1,100,000,000 for unemployment compensation and approximately $123 million for additional funds for fuel assistance.

With respect to my portion of that bill, Mr. Speaker, I am appalled with the knowledge that the Office of Management and Budget is opposing my bill. I do not think the President is aware of what is going on in the country. The attitude of this administration is ridiculous. In conversations yesterday with people in the employment offices in Illinois, I learned that 600 to 700 people per day have applications for employment that are being processed by the jobs services offices. Those offices are going to be cut by 800 people on February 15 unless something is done.

Last December, when the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. CONTE), offered a substitute amendment to the continuing resolution, assurances were given that no people would be laid off from employment services and no people would be laid off from unemployment compensation offices and that the offices would remain open. He said, in concluding that portion of his remarks, that if what he said was not true, the administration would file a supplemental budget request. That request has not yet been filed for the unemployment compensation and the administration indicates it will now oppose additional funds to keep those offices open.

CONCERN FOR CLOSING OF JOBS SERVICES OFFICES

(Mr. MORRISON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, with respect to the question of the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. YATES), there is tremendous interest in this measure which the gentleman has described to us and I look forward to the hearings.

I was interested in establishing whether the gentleman had an idea on the schedule for floor activity. Is there a possibility that this measure would be before the House for action during this next week?

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORRISON. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. YATES. I will tell the gentleman that I am advised that the schedule of the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. NATCHER) proposes the hearings to begin on Tuesday next at 1:30 p.m. in the gentleman's subcommittee room; that the bill is scheduled to come before the full committee on the following Thursday, 2 days later, and is scheduled for floor action either Monday or Tuesday of the following week.

I say to the gentleman that this is extremely important. I was told that the neighboring State of Oregon has already closed some of its unemployment offices when unemployment is almost doubling in that State. It just does not make sense to me. I just do not think that the President realizes what is going on in unemployment throughout the country.

Mr. MORRISON. I appreciate the gentleman's remarks and information and yes, within the State of Washington we already have a number of offices that have closed and so there is universal concern.

Mr. YATES. Which is wrong. Does not the gentleman agree with me that those offices should remain open?

Mr. MORRISON. We are very concerned about this and look forward to the hearings and the potential action on the floor as quickly as possible.

I thank the gentleman.

PERMISSION FOR COMMITTEE ON INTERIOR AND INSULAR AFFAIRS TO FILE REPORTS

Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs have until 5 p.m. today to file reports on the bills:

H.R. 5118. To provide water to the Papago Tribe of Arizona, and for other purposes; and

H.R. 4230. To facilitate the transportation of coal by pipeline across Federal and non-Federal lands.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. FOLEY). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota?

There was no objection.

JOSEPH DISEASE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California (Mr. COELHO) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. COELHO. Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to share with my colleagues a story which appeared in the Fresno Bee about a rare affliction known as Joseph disease. This debilitating disease named after Antone Joseph strikes those of Portuguese descent. Many of the brave people who suffer from this genetic disorder live in California's 15th Congressional District which I represent. A great-great-granddaughter of Antone Joseph, Rose Marie Silva, has formed the International Joseph Disease Foundation Inc., a group of dedicated people looking for a cure to Joseph disease and aiding its victims. This is a fine organization deserving of our full support.

[From the Fresno Bee, Dec. 14, 1981]

"OLD WORLD" DISORDER—RARE DISEASE SHATTERS AMERICAN DREAM

(By Ricardo Pimentel)

When Antone Joseph arrived in Livermore from the Azores Islands in 1844 he hoped to create a legacy of prosperity for himself and his family.

To be sure, some members got a piece of the American dream but others were left an Old World legacy of debilitating disease.

Joseph passed on an incurable disorder that still plagues family members. It's appropriately called Joseph disease, but it's not limited to the Joseph family. It strikes people from continental Portugal or the Azores.

Dr. Roger Rosenberg, a neurology and genetics specialist at the University of Texas Health Science Center in Dallas, diagnosed and named the disease in 1975. Since then, he's discovered that the disease has been around for as many as 400 years, often misdiagnosed as multiple sclerosis, Parkinson's disease or as a degeneration of spinal and cerebral functions.

New World explorer Ferdinand Magellan's crew may have even carried the disease to Japan in the 16th century. About 10 cases of Joseph disease have been detected there, Rosenberg said.

At Valley Children's Hospital in Fresno recently for a seminar, Rosenberg explained that Joseph disease is a genetic disorder that destroys the nerve cells in the brain and spinal cord that control movement.

Victims have trouble walking, with hand coordination and with speech and may appear to be intoxicated.

Investigation showed that about 600 members of the Joseph family in 11 generations have had or have the disease, Rosenberg said.

Rose Marie Silva, great-great-granddaughter of Antone Joseph, said the affliction, which can be slowed with drugs, was a family secret until she called Rosenberg in 1975.

"My father and brother died of it at 39 years of age," she said, explaining that she once dreaded that her three daughters might contract the then-nameless disease.

The concern is warranted. If a parent has the disease, the children have a 50-50 chance of developing it. The gene that causes the problem doesn't skip generations, said Dr. William Nyhan, a geneticist at the University of California at San Diego.

Nyhan travels with Rosenberg on his annual trip through Northern California, giving genetic advice to victims and conducting clinics where Portuguese-Americans' fears can be dispelled or confirmed.

"It's an ancient mutation," Nyhan said, describing the gene that causes the problem. "Its first expression occurs generally after people have had their children, so people didn't put things together."

However, he added, people as young as 17 and as old as 70 have contracted the disease.

David Coito, 43, of Turlock developed symptoms when he was 28. By 1977, he was an invalid. He has three cousins in Fresno who also have Joseph disease.

"They didn't know what he had. We took him to our family doctor who said it was something neurological," said his wife, Jane.

It wasn't diagnosed as Joseph disease until 1978.

"I remember it very vividly. The doctor told me, 'if you don't know how to drive, you'd better learn. Dave's going to die. He's not going to be able to work.' Dave proved them wrong," Jane said.

Coito, a former appliance store owner, smiled and nodded his head as he sat in his wheelchair.

"His mother had something, but it was diagnosed as MS (multiple sclerosis)," she said. "It's on her death certificate.

"When we first found out in 1968, we thought we were the only ones in the world with the disease. But 11 years later we found out we weren't alone. There was a sense of unity."

The reason they didn't feel alone was that they found Silva and the organization she formed, International Joseph Disease Foundation Inc.

The group, raising money through bake and garage sales, finances research and makes the annual informational trips possible.

"It's because of my children that I help as much as I do," Silva said.

Although she is at risk, Silva, 49, is not very frightened. Nyhan explained that the later the onset, the more mild the disease. So, even if Silva develops it, she will probably be able to lead a normal life.

Rosenberg and Nyhan said they tell people who have the disease about the risks of having children.

"Mainly the reaction has been to hold off on a family. Some get vasectomies, tubal ligations or adopt," said Nyhan.

Generally, a person will contract the disease at about the same as their parent did.

The symptoms include:

Weakness in arms and legs.

Spastic limbs.

Clumsy body movement.

Speech difficulties, such as slurring words.

Double vision and involuntary eye movement.

Frequent urination.

Nyhan cautioned, however, that a person shouldn't panic just because of a tumble unless your parent has had the disease, which may have been misdiagnosed.

TAX EXEMPTIONS FOR SEGREGATED PRIVATE SCHOOLS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. WASHINGTON) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. WASHINGTON. Mr. Speaker, in light of the controversy surrounding the President's claim that the Internal Revenue Service has no legal standing to deny tax-exempt status to private schools which discriminate on the basis of race, I want to share with my colleagues some of the statements made during yesterday's hearing by the Subcommittee on Civil and Constitutional Rights, which clarify and articulate the existing legal basis for the IRS to deny exemptions.

Supporting the argument that existing law compels and obligates the IRS to deny tax exemptions, the Honorable Arthur S. Flemming, Chairman of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights stated:

This decision by the Executive Branch is inconsistent in our judgement with the Executive's constitutional obligation and oath of office to faithfully execute our Nation's laws. The Executive Branch has acted without appropriate regard for a coequal branch of government whose "province and duty," as Chief Justice Marshall declared in Marbury v. Madison, is "to say what law is."

We do not need new legislation to set forth once again the policy of non-support on the part of the Federal government of schools that practice racial discrimination. What we do need is vigorous implementation by the Executve Branch of the policy set forth in the Constitution, Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, and the IRS Code as defined by the Federal courts.

Flemming went on to say that the Commission believes that the President should direct the IRS to comply with the mandate of the Federal courts and continue to deny tax exemptions to private schools that discriminate on the basis of race. "No Federal judge has suggested that new legislation is needed in order to strengthen the legal foundation on which this mandate rests."

Another distinguished witness, Mr. Carr Ferguson, former Assistant Attorney General in charge of the tax division of the Department of Justice, stated:

The Federal tax laws now on the books have been interpreted by every Federal appellate court which has considered the issue as prohibiting federal tax exemption benefits for schools with racially discriminatory policies. Accordingly, new tax laws are unnecessary to continue the Government's consistent position of the last decade that such private schools do not qualify as tax-exempt organizations under section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code.

Carr went on to say that instead of calling for new legislation, the Congress should leave to IRS and the Federal courts the reasoned, systematic enforcement of the settled interpretations of existing statutes.

Equally compelling and factual was the testimony of Mr. E. Richard Larson, staff counsel of the American Civil Liberties Union. Mr. Larson stated:

The American Civil Liberties Union disagrees with the President's position. In the ACLU's view, "the law" most certainly includes the Fifth Amendment, Title IV of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, and the rulings of the Supreme Court and of the lower federal courts.

The primary prohibition against federal government involvement, direct or indirect, in racial discrimination is the equal protection component of the Fifth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. The Constitution has been consistently applied by the federal courts and interpreted by Congress to deny government aid to racially discriminatory private schools.

Larson emphasized that—

The decision Green v. Connally, 330 F. Supp. 1150 (D.D.C. 1971) aff'd sub. nom. Coit v. Green, 404 U.S. 997 (1971), did not occur in isolation, but followed three other three-judge court decisions which had ruled "that it was unconstitutional for Government to aid racially discriminatory private schools through the use of tuition grants, and each of these three rulings was affirmed by the Supreme Court." South Carolina State Board of Education, 296 F. Supp. 199 (D.S.C. 1968), aff'd mem., 393 U.S. 222 (1968); Poindexter v. Louisiana Financial Assistance Commission, 275 F. Supp. 833 (E.D.La. 1967), aff'd mem., 389 U.S. 571 (1968); Lee v. Macon County Board of Education, 267 F. Supp. 458 (M.D.Ala. 1967), aff'd mem. sub nom. Wallace v. United States, 389 U.S. 215 (1967); see also, Coffey v. State Educational Finance Commission, 296 F. Supp. 1389 (S.D.Miss. 1969).

Mr. Carr reiterated this point, and emphasized that Congress has already noted its approval of the Green decision. As he stated:

In 1976, Congress added S501(i) to the Code which explicitly denies tax exempt status to social clubs that discriminate against "any person on the basis of race, color, or religion." This legislation specifically overturned a contrary district court construction of the Code. The Senate report on the private club provision cites Green as the leading case on the issue of private schools that discriminate on the basis of race not qualifying for tax exemptions.

So Mr. Speaker, not only is there constitutional authority for the IRS to act, numerous court rulings based on these constitutional provisions, and the actions of this legislative body, all give a foundation on which the IRS can stand. Both the Treasury and the IRS in fact remain bound by the Court's ruling interpreting the Constitution and other laws as requiring the denial of tax-exempt status to racially discriminatory private schools. Clearly the issue is not a lack of legal standing on the part of IRS. The real issue is the unwillingness of the Chief Executive to exercise his sworn constitutional oath to uphold the laws our land.

There is one final issue which should be clarified. Some of my colleagues expressed concern that since the IRS has placed new applications for private school tax exemptions on hold, this may delay the approval of applications from parochial schools and other schools which do not racially discriminate.

We contacted the IRS Public Affairs Office. They said that this was not the case. Only applications from schools which have a policy of racial discrimination have been placed on hold. All other applications are being processed without delay. Schools which do not racially discriminate are unaffected. The President should act, and act at once; but until he does, there is no danger of innocents being caught in the crossfire.●

TO PROVIDE PRICE SUPPORT LOANS TO ALL PRODUCERS OF THE 1981 CROP OF RICE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Arkansas (Mr. ALEXANDER) is recognized for 10 minutes.

● Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced a bill to provide a measure of equity to all rice producers in the United States in terms of eligibility for the Commodity Credit Corporation nonrecourse loan program.

As many of my colleagues know, the agricultural economy of America is at a standstill today unlike anything we have seen since the Great Depression. Many farmers are searching for adequate credit to finance their 1982 operations while others face an absolute denial from their lenders due to their heavy debt load.

The depression in agriculture cuts across almost all commodity producers. However, while all wheat, feed grains, and cotton producers are able to secure a nonrecourse loan from the Commodity Credit Corporation, only a portion of the Nation's rice producers are eligible to do so.

This anomaly was corrected by the 1981 farm bill as far as producers of 1982 crop rice is concerned. Beginning with the 1982 crop, all rice producers will become eligible for the CCC loan program as well as the target-price provisions.

However, there is a group of producers holding a majority of the rice produced in 1981 who have no alternative to an almost totally inactive rice market. It includes producers with acreage allotments who have been allowed by law to plant in excess of those allotments and it includes new rice producers who have gone into rice production since the program was opened in 1975 to all those wanting to produce it.

The market has declined from an average price of $12.90 per hundredweight a year ago to an average of $9.12 per hundredweight January 1, the last date reported by USDA. This is more than a 25-percent reduction in price in 1 year and it is far below costs of production. Since most rice is ineligible for the CCC loan program, there is nothing to prevent prices from continuing to decline.

Currently, most rice producers with acreage allotments who are eligible to utilize the CCC loan have done so. The 1981 rice crop is estimated by USDA to have been 185 million hundredweight and they expect a carryover of 54 million hundredweight in excess of domestic and export demand by the end of the marketing year. As of January 1, there was 46 million hundredweight on hand in my State of Arkansas alone. Yet, less than 25 million hundredweight has been placed under CCC loan and the rest of it is ineligible until my bill becomes law.

My bill will enable all producers of rice to utilize the alternative of placing excess rice stocks under loan with the CCC until sufficient market demand reappears. This will enable those producers to continue to operate in 1982 by providing them with critically needed financing. Those producers newly eligible for the CCC loan upon enactment of my bill will be required to meet the same conditions as all others eligible for the CCC loan program.●

SAM MUCHNICK "MR. WRESTLING" STEPS DOWN

(Mr. PRICE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

● Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, a truly outstanding person and one of my closest friends, Mr. Sam Muchnick retired this month. Mr. Muchnick also happens to be the No. 1 wrestling promoter in the United States and is known in the profession throughout the world for his personal integrity and the high standards of values and fairness he has brought to the sport. In my long association with the sports field I have found Sam to be one of the most respected people in the field. As stated in the article by Roert L. Burnes in the January 9-10, 1982, St. Louis Globe-Democrat, which I am including at the close of my remarks, few people have as many friends as Sam.

I am deeply honored to have such an outstanding person as my friend for so many years, and I wish Sam every success and satisfaction in whatever he does next. I look forward, as I am sure Sam's many friends do, to many more years of association with this great and humane person. He has made so many people's lives so much more meaningful and rewarding. With his great gifts he can continue, and I am sure he will, to help his many friends to lead happier and more rewarding lives.

I commend to all of my colleagues the following article from the St. Louis Globe-Democrat as a way to become a little better acquainted with my outstanding friend Sam Muchnick. I am sure you will find this to be a rewarding experience.

"MR. WRESTLING" STEPS DOWN

Now that he has finally made official the retirement he has long threatened, wrestling promoter Sam Muchnick will have time to do other things. He stepped down after his card of Jan. 1, turning over the reins to wrestler Pat O'Connor and his long time assistant, Larry Matysik.

A man of many interests, most of them involved with sports, Sam will not lack for things to do. He might even return to his first love, writing about sports.

With a straight face, Muchnick has long maintained that he is the third best sports writer in the world.

Who is number one?

Pulitzer Prize winner Walter "Red" Smith of the New York Times. They were playmates and walking partners and fun seekers when they patrolled the Cardinal baseball beat 50 years ago, Smith for the St. Louis Star and Muchnick for the St. Louis Times, now both out of business.

And who is the second best?

Why, whichever sports writer he happens to be talking to at the moment.

It has been a running joke for years. Sam has enjoyed it, so have his friends, especially when another sports writer walks into the room and learns that he has been replaced as number two. And that has happened frequently.

Even though he has been involved with professional wrestling for almost 50 years—first as assistant to promoter Tom Packs and then for more than 35 years on his own—and even though he has become the number one man nationally in that sport, Muchnick still talks almost with reverence of the days when he traveled with the Cardinals. The days when Frank Frisch, Burleigh Grimes, Pepper Martin and Jim Bottomley were friends and heroes, when his writing pals were Red Smith, Mike Haley of The Globe-Democrat and Roy Stockton of the Post-Dispatch, the days when he was third baseman on a training camp team which included Cardinal owner Sam Breadon, Dr. Bob Hyland and George P. Vierheller, director of the St. Louis Zoo and an avid Cardinal fan.

"It was great fun, it was exciting . . . the Cardinals were winning pennants and World Series . . . they were playing all the games in the afternoon and you had all night in New York or Chicago to enjoy life . . . there has never been anything like it," beams Sam.

Muchnick did not leave sports writing by choice.

"The Times was bought by the Star in June of 1932," he points out. "We had two hours warning and were given two weeks pay . . . nothing more. In the depths of the Depression, I was out of work."

He caught on with Packs as publicist and eventually as assistant. He stayed with Packs for almost 10 years; they finally broke up because of fundamental differences and Muchnick went out on his own.

"I had made a lot of friends in the business but I was bucking the establishment," he recalls. "Lots of wrestlers told me they'd like to work for me but feared the repercussions. But some did and I was grateful."

Muchnick was barely gaining a foothold in the wrestling world when World War II intervened. Although in his late thirties, he enlisted in the Army Air Corps.

"I fought the battle of the Panama Canal," he says. "That's where I was stationed."

After his discharge, Muchnick plunged ahead. It is a matter of record that within five years, he was the dominant figure in the sport of wrestling in the United States. He served for more than 25 years as president of the National Wrestling Alliance, made up of promoters from coast to coast. They valued his judgment and they all prospered.

In recent years, protesting that the work load was too much, he was finally allowed to step down as president—but the phone still rings constantly in his office and other promoters still lean on him for advice.

So much so that a couple of years ago, one of the better known promoters called with a strange request. The man's wife had died a few years before and he was planning to marry again but wanted to avoid publicity. "I'm coming to St. Louis to get married," he said. "You arrange it, Sam."

Muchnick did just that. He called his good friend, Monsignor Lou Meyer, who performed the ceremony.

One point should be made. The so-called sport of wrestling is often more hippodrome and theater than sport. It is generally accepted, although no one will admit it, that the championship is controlled.

Muchnick grins when people talk about it. Jack Buck and Joe Garagiola, his close friends, have kidded him unmercifully at public gatherings about this and he continues to smile.

However, it is a tribute to his personal integrity and popularity that he is one of the most respected people in sports in St. Louis. Few people have more friends than Sam Muchnick.

I have known him for more than 40 years. I look upon him as one of my closest and dearest friends—and above all, one of the most honest. To my knowledge, he has never lied to me or misdirected me. I have had to ask him searching questions about wrestling on a few occasions and he has always given me direct, straightforward answers.

Sam is in the same category with Bing Devine, Ben Kerner and Bob Fishel (now assistant to the president of the American League) who also have never lied to me. That is why I hold them in such high esteem.

Muchnick was saddened early last year by the sudden death of his beloved wife, Helen. He's also lost several close friends in recent years—Cardinal baseball scout Joe Mathes, former Cardinal traveling secretary Leo Ward, and one-time football star Wilson R. (Bud) Schwenk. When Helen Muchnick died, the wrestling world came to a complete stop around the country. Every promoter and many of the top wrestlers were here for the funeral.

Muchnick admits his life has been split in half—B.H. and A.H.—"Before Helen and After Helen." He liked the bright lights and the good life of the bachelor until, in his late 40s, he and Helen Wildfong were married. "She changed my life," he says simply, "and much for the better." The Muchnicks have two sons, Dr. Richard of St. Louis and Dan of Macon, Ga. and a daughter, Kathie of St. Louis.

The loyalty of the wrestlers who work for him is something in which Muchnick takes great pride but, as Pat O'Connor says, "it is mostly because every wrestler in the game knows that Sam's word is his bond. He has never shortchanged any of us."

Years ago, when Muchnick was just gaining a foothold as a wrestling promoter, he was faced with a disaster at one of this first big shows at Kiel Auditorium. A blizzard struck without warning shortly before the show. Only a few hundred fans struggled to get there. Despite this, the card went on.

Muchnick took a financial beating. As he sat in his cubicle office at Kiel afterwards, waiting to pay the wrestlers their fees, Fritz Von Erich, one of the top "villains" of the era, walked in.

"Sam, the other boys have appointed me spokesman," Von Erich said. "We've talked it over . . . you've always been more than fair with us. We know you didn't make expenses tonight so all of us want to waive our fees. Just give us our expenses . . . and if you don't have that . . . well, you can owe it to us."

Muchnick was moved to tears.

"But I paid off in full," he remembers. "It almost wiped me out at the time but I've never forgotten it."

Still another incident occurred more recently when Muchnick had a card scheduled, headed by Terry Funk, then world champion, and Johnny Valentine, a popular figure with the fans. Late the night before the show, which was sold out, Muchnick got a phone call from Valentine.

"I dislocated my shoulder here tonight in Houston," Valentine said. "The doctors tell me I can't work. If you want, Sam, I'll fly in so that if you can get a substitute, I can let everybody know why I'm not working."

"That wasn't the problem," Sam explains. "We had a sellout and a good part of it was Valentine's popularity. I had two choices. Even if I got a replacement, it was too late to get the word out. The fans wouldn't know until they came to the auditorium. So I either had to cancel the card or come up with a good enough replacement to satisfy everybody. Even so, I was prepared to offer any fan his money back if he wanted it."

The only possible replacement, Muchnick felt, was Gene Kiniski, the former world champion, a rough and tumble performer who was popular mostly because he irritated fans. He called Kiniski at his home in Vancouver, British Columbia, and explained the situation. "I doubt that you can make it," Sam said, "but you're my only hope."

"In other words, if I can't make it," Kiniski replied, "you take a bath."

That's about the size of it, Muchnick told him.

"The weather's pretty bad up here," Kiniski reported, "but I'll try. I may not make it until show time but I'll give it a shot."

Not knowing whether he'd have a show or not, the worried Muchnick walked into his office at 9:30 the next morning to find Kiniski sprawled in a chair.

"Where the hell you been?" Kiniski snarled. "I'm hungry. The least you can do is buy me breakfast. I shoulda stopped by your house and had Helen fix my breakfast but I couldn't remember your address."

Kiniski had driven through bad weather from Vancouver to Seattle, caught the red eye special and flown all night.

"Of course I bought his breakfast," Muchnick reminisces. "I couldn't believe that he had made it. Besides, I'm happy that he came to the office. When he and Helen got together in the kitchen, it was always chaos."

In addition to his wrestling talents, Kiniski considers himself the best cook in the world.

"He came out to the house often because he enjoyed discussing cooking with my wife," says Muchnick. "They never agreed; they'd wind up hollering at each other but the results were always good, no matter which one won out on which recipe to use."

Muchnick is proud of the loyalty and friendship of the wrestlers. Another close friend is the rugged crowd pleaser, "Dick the Bruiser" Afflis. The Bruiser has leaned on Muchnick for advice and counsel in business dealings and is comfortably well off today, as much from real estate enterprises as wrestling.

A few years ago, Muchnick was in the hospital and a firm "No Visitors Allowed" sign was posted. "We had to do that whenever Sam was in the hospital," a doctor friend once observed. "Otherwise, he wouldn't get any rest."

This did not stop the Bruiser. He borrowed a black homburg and strode into the hospital. To anyone who tried to stop him, he merely said "I'm Rabbi Afflis" and kept right on walking.

In his earlier days, Muchnick was a confirmed practical joker.

"I learned from the best, Ray Steele," he confesses. "He was the master. He was always pulling stuff on me. I finally got even once. We drove to Kansas City and stopped on the highway for lunch. He excused himself from the table, went out, moved the car and hid with it. When I got up to leave, I couldn't find Steele or the car and figured he'd gone on and left me out in the middle of nowhere. He let me stew for 15 minutes before he showed up. When we got to Kansas City, I swiped the car keys, stuck them in an envelope, mailed them back to St. Louis. I was going to stay over and he was going to drive back to St. Louis alone. It's the only time I ever put one over on him."

However, another practical joke—this one involving Gene Kiniski—never came off.

A Catholic priest, a devoted wrestling fan, cordially detested Kiniski for his rough tactics.

"What the priest didn't know," Muchnick explains, "was that Kiniski, outside the ring, was a devout Catholic, a dedicated family man. A couple of us thought it would be a great gimmick some Sunday morning to go out to his church, wait until he was in the pulpit and then walk Kiniski down the center aisle to a front pew."

Sam admits he didn't have the heart to pull it off because "a church is no place for a practical joke. It could have been a terrible embarrassment for the priest who was my good friend."

And Sam Muchnick enjoys the company of his good friends. Even though he has never played golf in his life, he joined Norwood Hills Country Club some years ago, mostly on the urging of Bud Schwenk and Bob Victor and some other pals. A couple of Fridays a month, he leads a group of his roistering buddies to Jack English's Tavern in Belleville for lunch. Why? Well, simply because Tommy McMahon, longtime bartender at the St. Louis Press Club and one of the city's great characters, is on duty there on Friday. Tommy has virtually retired but puts in a day or two a week at English's perhaps because it is a handy place en route to the race track.

"I've always thought that Joe Mathes was one of the finest people I ever knew," Muchnick says. "I was one of the organizers of the Press Club; I'm a charter member and Joe enjoyed talking with Tommy. So Joe would come by the office and invite himself to the Press Club as my guest. Then he and Tommy would sit at the bar and swap stories."

Mathes died three years ago but Muchnick's fond memories live on. He goes to English's because he knows that's what Joe would have done. And he orders a "Joe Mathes" from Tommy McMahon. It is simply a Rob Roy but at English's it is known as a Joe Mathes. And each time he is there, Muchnick, who shouldn't eat such things, devours a fried catfish sandwich because that's what Mathes would have ordered.

On two occasions, Muchnick has brought the huge wrestler, Andre the Giant, along and that created quite a stir in Belleville.

Arriving at English's, there is always a welcoming party of attorney Bob McGlynn or television's Jim Bolen or retired newsman S.L. Van Petten or Sheriff Cobby Rodrigues or Cleveland Indian manager Dave Garcia or Jimmy Connors' mother, Gloria, all friends of Muchnicks. . .or perhaps all of them.

Whenever he is in town, Muchnick's great friend, Congressman Mel Price is sure to drop in.

Price sits quietly, amused as always by Muchnick's outgoing conviviality.

"Sam's not doing anything different here than he does in Washington," he says. "He came up to visit a few weeks ago and we were invited to a party at the vice president's home. It was pretty swank but that didn't bother Sam one bit.

"He and the vice-president got talking about sports and neglected everybody else. When the party was over, George Bush said 'call me the next time you're coming and we'll have lunch.'"

Like Harry Truman, a man he admires tremendously, Sam Muchnick has no middle name. The irrepressible Kid Regan, a night club and sports columnist long ago with the Star-Times, was the one who supplied a middle name . . . Xavier. Another sports writer, Ray Gillespie, never called Muchnick anything else than Xavier. It is one of numerous nicknames Muchnick owns . . . "Commish" for his duties as the commissioner of the National Wrestling Alliance is probably the most popular.

Muchnick is ribbed, needled and kidded constantly by his friends who are merely repaying him in kind for the constant barbs he issues.

He will have more time now to enjoy his friends in retirement. He will have more time to travel to Georgia to visit his grandchildren. But Sam won't change much . . . except he keeps threatening to spend more time writing.

The "world's third best sports writer" thing, of course, is strictly a gag but Muchnick is proud of his early background in baseball. He has turned down one offer to write his memoirs but he might change his mind now.

If he is the third best, it is one of the few things in his life in which Sam Muchnick does not rank first . . . right at the top.●

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

PROTECTING SENIOR CITIZENS AGAINST INFLATION

HON. DON RITTER
OF PENNSYLVANIA

Friday, January 29, 1982

● Mr. RITTER. Mr. Speaker, the ravages of inflation have hit us all, but none more than our senior citizens. Because our older citizens are, for the most part, on fixed incomes, it is important they take advantage of all allowable tax deductions, exemptions, and credits.

For this reason, I am submitting for the RECORD the second part of the revised checklist of itemized deductions for use in preparing Federal income taxes prepared by the Senate Select Committee on Aging. This checklist also highlights the changes in the tax code as a result of the Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981.

I hope our senior citizens will find this information useful in preparing their 1981 Federal income tax returns.

Form 1040 checklist is as follows:

FORM 1040 CHECKLIST

CONTRIBUTIONS

In general, contributions to religious, charitable, educational, scientific, or literary organizations may be deducted up to 50 percent of your adjusted gross income (line 31, Form 1040). Contributions to certain private nonoperating foundations, veterans organizations, fraternal societies, or nonprofit cemetery companies are limited to 20 percent of adjusted gross income (line 31, Form 1040). There is a limit of 30 percent of adjusted gross income for contributions of certain capital gain property. Special rules also apply to contributions of appreciated property. To deduct your contributions, you must make them in cash or other property before the close of your tax year. Other property (clothing, books, furniture, etc.) is deducted at the fair market value. You may deduct contributions you charge to your bank credit card in the year the charge is made.

Examples of other charitable contributions include:

The cost and upkeep of uniforms that you must wear while performing charitable activities.

Out-of-pocket expenses (postage, phone calls, stationery) while providing services without pay to a charitable organization.

Payment of more than the fair market value to an organization for goods, merchandise, services, banquets, shows, sporting events, etc.

You may also deduct unreimbursed out-of-pocket expenses directly related to services you give to a charitable organization, such as gas and oil for your car. If you do not want to deduct actual expenses, you may use a standard rate of 9 cents a mile. In either case you may deduct parking fees and tolls.

CASUALTY OR THEFT LOSSES

You may deduct casualty losses, such as tornado, flood, storm, fire, auto accident (provided not caused by a willful act or willful negligence), or theft losses. The amount of your casualty loss deduction is generally the lesser of (1) the decrease in fair market value of the property as a result of the casualty, or (2) your adjusted basis in the property. This amount must be further reduced by any insurance of other recovery, and, in the case of property held for personal use, by the $100 limitation. Report your casualty or theft loss on Schedule A. If more than one item was involved in a single casualty or theft, or if you had more than one casualty or theft during the year, use Form 4684 for computing your personal casualty loss.

MISCELLANEOUS DEDUCTIONS

In addition to the other itemized deductions, you may deduct certain miscellaneous expenses on Schedule A, Form 1040. A list of the most common expenses follows. For more information, see Publication 529, Miscellaneous Deductions.

Educational expenses.—Amounts you paid for education that is: (1) Required by your employer to maintain your position, or (2) for maintaining or improving skills you must have in your present position.

Business use of your home.—You can deduct expenses for business use of part of your home only if you use that part exclusively and continuously in your work and for the convenience of your employer.

Employer expenses.—Examples of expenses you can deduct if you were not reimbursed for them are:

Union dues.

Safety equipment, small tools, and supplies you need for your job.

Protective clothing, such as hard hats and safety shoes.

Uniforms required by your employer which you cannot usually wear away from work.

Maintenance of uniforms required by your employer.

Costs of bond, if required for employment.

Physical examinations required by your employer.

Dues to professional organizations and chambers of commerce.

Fees to employment agencies and other costs to get a new job in your present trade or profession.

Expenses of producing income.—You can deduct what you paid to produce or collect taxable income or to manage or protect property held for producing income.

Examples of these expenses are:

Tax return preparation fees.

Safe deposit box rental.

Custodial (e.g., trust accounts) fees.

Fees paid to investment counselors.

Fees to collect interest or dividends.

Gambling losses, but not more than gambling winnings.

CREDITS

Tax credits are used to reduce the amounts for tax you owe. All credits must be taken on Form 1040, with the exception of the credit for contributions to candidates for public office and the earned income credit.

The most common credits are:

CREDIT FOR THE ELDERLY

You may be able to claim this credit and reduce taxes by as much as $375 (if single) or $562.50 (if married filing jointly) if you are: (1) Age 65 or over, or (2) under the age 65 and retired under a public retirement system.

For more information see the instructions for Schedule R & RP.

EARNED INCOME CREDIT

If you have a dependent child who shares your principal residence in the United States, you may be entitled to a special payment or credit of up to $500. This is called the earned income credit. It may come as a refund check or be applied against any taxes owed. Generally, if you reported earned income and had adjusted gross income (line 32a, Form 1040 or line 10, Form 1040A) of less than $10,000, you may be able to claim the credit.

Earned income means wages, salaries, tips, strike benefits, other employee compensation, disability pensions, and net earnings from self-employment (generally the amount shown on Schedule SE (Form 1040) line 13). A married couple must file a joint return to be eligible for the credit. Certain married persons living apart with a dependent child may also be eligible to claim the credit.

For more information, see instructions for Form 1040 or 1040A.

CREDIT FOR CHILD AND DEPENDENT CARE EXPENSES

A portion of certain payments made for child and dependent care may be claimed as a credit against tax.

If you maintained a household that included your dependent under age 15 or a dependent or spouse incapable of self-care, you may be allowed a 20 percent credit for employment related child and dependent care expenses. These expenses must have been paid during the taxable year in order to enable you to work either full or part time.

The maximum amount of the credit is $400 for one qualifying individual and $800 for two or more qualifying individuals.

See Form 2441 for more information, including a special rule for divorced or separated taxpayers.

RESIDENTIAL ENERGY CREDIT

The residential energy credit was designed to encourage energy saving and the development of renewable energy sources. There are two energy credits, each with its own conditions and limits. These credits are based on: (1) Costs for home energy conservation, and (2) costs for renewable energy source property.

A credit of up to $300 may be claimed for expenditures for energy conservation property installed in or on your principal residence, whether you own or rent it. The residence must have been substantially completed by April 20, 1977. Items eligible for the credit are limited to the following: Insulation (fiberglass, cellulose, etc.) for ceilings, walls, floors, roofs, water heaters, etc.; exterior storm (or thermal) windows or doors; calking or weatherstripping for exterior windows or doors; a furnace replacement burner that reduces the amount of fuel used; a device to make fuel openings (for a heating system) more efficient; an electrical or mechanical furnace ignition system that replaces a gas pilot light; an automatic energy-saving setback thermostat; and a meter that displays the cost of energy usage.

For years beginning after 1979, the maximum credit for renewable energy source property is $4,000. Equipment used in the production or distribution of heat or electricity from solar, geothermal, or wind energy sources for residential heating, cooling, or other purposes may qualify for this credit.

Examples of items which do not qualify for energy credit are the following: Carpeting, drapes, awnings, shades, wood paneling, fire screens, new or replacement walls (except for insulation inside the walls), exterior siding, heat pump, wood or peat burning stoves, fluorescent lights, hydrogen fueled residential equipment, equipment using wind energy for transportation, expenditures for a swimming pool used as an energy storage medium, and greenhouses.

For further information, consult the instructions for Form 5695, "Residential Energy Credits," and IRS Publication 903, Energy Credits for Individuals.

SALE OF YOUR PERSONAL RESIDENCE

You may exclude from your gross income some or all of your gain from the sale or exchange of your principal residence, if you meet certain age, ownership, and occupancy requirements at the time of the sale or exchange. If you were age 55 or older on the date of sale or exchange you may elect to exclude up to $100,000 of gain provided you owned and occupied the residence for 3 of the 5 years ending on the date of sale (or 5 of 8 years if you were 65 or older on the date of the sale or exchange and the sale took place before July 26, 1981). For sales or exchanges after July 20, 1981, the excludable amount is increased to $125,000.

In addition, payment of the tax on the gain from the sale or exchange of your personal residence in excess of the excluded amount will be deferred if, within 18 months before or 18 months after the sale or exchange, you buy and occupy another residence, the cost of which equals or exceeds the adjusted sales price of the old residence. For sales or exchanges after July 20, 1981, the replacement period is extended to 2 years before and after the sale. This 2-year period also applies to sales and exchanges of principal residences before July 20, 1981, if the replacement period expires after that date.

Taxable gains from the sale of your residence should be reported on Schedule D, line 2a or 9a. Losses from such a sale are not deductible. Form 2119, Sale or Exchange of Principal Residence, is used to report the sale of your principal residence whether or not you bought another one.

Publication 523, Tax Information on Selling Your Home, is available at most IRS offices.

HIGHLIGHTS FOR NEXT YEAR'S TAXES

The Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981 made many important changes in tax law. Some of these changes were effective for tax year 1981, and are reflected in this publication. Other changes are effective for tax years 1982 and later. For a more complete discussion of the highlights of the recent tax changes, you should refer to IRS Publication 553, Highlights of 1981 Tax Changes, and your Form 1040 or 1040A Instructions.

CHARITABLE CONTRIBUTIONS

For tax years beginning after 1981, individuals who do not itemize their personal deductions will be allowed to deduct 25 percent of the first $100 of contributions ($50 for a married person filing a separate return). These deductible amounts will increase until 1986. This provision does not apply to contributions made after 1986.

DEDUCTIONS FOR TWO-EARNER MARRIED COUPLES

In tax years beginning after 1981, two-earner married couples filing jointly will be allowed a deduction based upon the earnings of the spouse with the least income. The 1982 maximum deduction will be $1,500.

CHILD AND DEPENDENT CARE CREDIT

For tax years beginning after 1981, the percentage will change for some taxpayers and the maximum amount of employment related expenses to which the credit can be applied is increased. In addition, expenditures for out-of-home, noninstitutional care of disabled spouse or dependent, who regularly spends at least 8 hours a day in the taxpayer's home, are eligible for the credit. These dependent care centers must be in compliance with all State and local regulations for the taxpayer to count such expenditures toward qualified expenses.

SAVINGS INCENTIVES

All-savers certificate.—An exclusion of up to $1,000 or $2,000 for a joint return is provided for interest on qualified savings certificates. These "all-savers" certificates must be issued after September 30, 1981, and before January 1, 1983, and must have a yield equal to 70 percent of the yield on 1-year Treasury bills.

Dividend exclusion.—Beginning in 1982, the allowable deduction will be $100 on a separate return and $200 on a joint return. There will no longer be any exclusion of dividends and interest.

Exclusion of reinvested stock dividends from public utilities.—Beginning in 1982, shareholders in a domestic public utility corporation who choose to receive their dividends in the form of common stock may exclude up to $750 ($1,500 for a joint return) from taxable income.

Individual retirement accounts.—For tax years after December 31, 1981, the limit on contributions will be increased to the lesser of 100 percent of compensation or $2,000. In addition, workers covered by a company or government pension may participate in an IRA. The new law has also increased the limit on spousal IRA and eliminated the provisions that contributions be equally divided. See Publication 590, Tax Information on Individual Retirement Arrangement, for more information.

Keogh plans.—For tax years beginning after December 31, 1981, important changes were made to the rules on self-employment (H.R. 10/Keogh) retirement plans. Some of the changes include: (1) An increased limit on the deductible amount an employer can pay to a plan on behalf of a self-employed individual, (2) the new right of a participant in an H.R. 10 plan to make payments to an individual retirement arrangement (IRA), (3) an increased limit on each employee's compensation that may be taken into account in figuring contributions or benefits under the plan, and (4) the new right to make a tax-free withdrawal of excess payments. For more information, see Publication 560, Tax Information on Self-Employed Retirement Plans.●

CBS NEWS DISTORTS CHEMICAL WARFARE SITUATION

HON. NEWT GINGRICH

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, January 29, 1982

● Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, not since the 1930's, when the London Times consistently misled the British people about the dangers of Hitler and Nazi militarism, have we seen as thoroughly and dangerously inaccurate coverage of the news as CBS television has engaged in for the last year.

If CBS News would be subject to accuracy in reporting laws it would soon be bankrupt.

The Wall Street Journal yesterday analyzed one example of CBS News's bias and falsehood. The editorial follows:

LAST TO KNOW

(Senator GARY HART. I certainly don't think the United States ought to take the lead in stimulating an arms race in the chemical-warfare field.

(SCHIEFFER. The situation is a classic case of how the arms race is fueled. Both the United States and the Soviet Union already have huge stores of chemical weapons, but after four years of trying they've been unable to figure out a way to police a treaty banning their manufacture, since it's so easy to make the weapons in secret. So, as always happens when a treaty can't be hammered out, the pressure increases to hammer out new weapons.—Bob Schieffer, CBS News, the Pentagon.)

Television writers are masters of compression, and it is no mean feat to compress so much misinformation into a text of about 100 words.

The above sentences were the conclusion of a CBS news segment Monday night that is best understood as an editorial opposing the prospective U.S. deployment of binary chemical munitions. For years the U.S. has maintained a stock of deadly nerve gases as a deterrent against chemical attack. While the new binary munitions offer some military advantages, essentially they are a safety measure. Two non-lethal constituents of the gas would be stored in separate compartments of a shell and not mixed until during flight. The principal change is safer storage and transportation of weapons comparable to ones that have existed for years.

Under these circumstances, it's difficult to see how a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee can talk of the proposed development as something that would "take the lead in stimulating an arms race." Under the circumstances of what we know the Soviets are doing, such talk is obscene.

A Super Bowl tease, intended to revive the flagging ratings of CBS News, promised that Dan Rather would tell us whether the Soviets are developing such weapons. In fact, the report only passingly referred to "allegations" of Soviet use of chemical weapons. As viewers of ABC learned a month ago, there is very little point in continuing to deny the fact of "yellow rain," and it involves not chemical but biological toxin weapons.

The point is that what the Soviets are doing is in blatant violation of not one but two international treaties: The Geneva conventions outlawing the use of such weapons, and the biological weapons convention outlawing their production, possession or transfer to third parties. While it is true that no treaty bans the manufacture of chemical weapons, the evidence is that the Soviets will go ahead and make the weapons even if there is a treaty. The notion that pressure for new weapons arises from the lack of a treaty is, to be charitable, gibberish.

The pressure for new weapons, chemical or nuclear or otherwise, arises from the Soviet threat, and nowhere is this more dramatically revealed than in Soviet chemical and biological warfare activities. It is not surprising that news organizations would fall in the ratings if they are the last to know.●

FOR A FREE CUBA

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

Friday, January 29, 1982

● Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues three bills introduced by me in the first session of this Congress to recognize the heroism displayed by freedom-loving Cubans who continue to oppose the oppressive and totalitarian regime of Fidel Castro. It was 22 years ago today that the evil dictator imposed his bloody rule upon the unsuspecting people of Cuba, once considered the lovely "Pearl of the Caribbean."

One of my bills would serve to commend the "Declaration of Freedom" adopted by a group of Cuban exiles in 1966 in which they "swear before God Almighty to fight constantly" for a Cuba free from communism.

Another of my bills is to authorize and request the President to proclaim January 28, 1982, the "Day of Marti, Apostle of Liberty" in recognition of Jose Marti, who founded the democratic tradition of Cuba at the beginning of this century and was martyred as a guerrilla fighting for a free Cuba.

The third bill is to express the determination of the United States to prevent the Soviet Union and Cuba, acting individually or collectively, from extending their aggressive or subversive activities by force or threat of force to any part of this hemisphere, and to work with our neighbors to insure freedom and self-determination for all people of this hemisphere.

It is my hope on this sad day of commemoration of a barbarous event that all of us who fervently support the freedom of Cuba will, joined by others of my colleagues, be instrumental in relighting the eternal flame of human liberty, dignity, and prosperity for the subjugated Cuban people.●

AID AND COMFORT FOR OPEC

HON. THOMAS A. DASCHLE

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

Friday, January 29, 1982

● Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. Speaker, the Treasury Department has quietly announced its proposal to repeal selected business energy tax incentives including the 4-cent-per-gallon excise tax exemption for gasohol. Mr. Speaker, this proposal is bankrupt.

Four months ago as the Nation's economy was beginning to falter following approval of the administration's complete economic program by Congress, some people began to have doubts about the recently enacted tax bill. Some of those doubts became proposals to amend the tax bill. The chairman of the Senate Finance Committee solicited the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, Donald Regan, on the advisability of amending the tax bill and not surprisingly Secretary Regan opposed any revision in the tax measure. In part, Secretary Regan said:

The stop-and-go policies of the past have undermined the Government's credibility, and such a sudden about-face would convince individuals and business alike that the government is not to be counted upon, and that no commitment to save or invest was worth making in the current uncertain situation.

Four months later, the words of Secretary Regan have a decidedly hollow ring. No longer is Secretary Regan concerned about stop-and-go policies, the credibility of the Government, or the stifling of investment because of uncertainty. In a change of opinion which is like the difference between night and day, Secretary Regan now advocates the stop-and-go policy of repealing in 1982 the 4-cent-per-gallon excise tax exemption for gasohol which is scheduled to expire in 1992 and the repudiation of the commitment made by the Government to people who have invested in the production of alcohol fuel.

Last year, Mr. Speaker, the United States imported 250,000 barrels of oil every hour. Oil imports last year cost our country $78 billion. In spite of the so-called oil glut, in 1981 the United States remained substantially dependent on uncertain supplies of costly energy imports and our Nation remained vulnerable to a major oil supply disruption. Now is not the time to stifle investment in the production of important renewable fuels like alcohol fuel. Now is not the time to discourage production of domestic renewable fuels and give aid and comfort to OPEC.

The Treasury Department estimates an additional $100 million in Federal revenue in 1983 as a result of repealing the gasohol excise tax exemption and other selected business energy tax incentives. This additional revenue will do very little to reduce the projected budget deficit of $152.3 billion in 1983. If the proposal of the Treasury is intended to substantially increase Federal revenue, the Treasury Department should instead propose repeal of the very generous tax breaks for oil, gas, and other fossil fuel producers. These tax breaks will exceed an estimated $6 billion in 1983 compared to the $100 million in incentives which the Treasury Department has proposed to repeal.

In conclusion, the Treasury Department proposal is not good energy policy. It is not good tax policy. It is not good fiscal policy. And it is certainly not good national policy. The proposal of the Treasury Department is bankrupt and it should be defeated.●

SKY VIEW HIGH SCHOOL MARCHING BAND

HON. JAMES V. HANSEN

OF UTAH

Friday, January 29, 1982

● Mr. HANSEN of Utah. Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to bring to the attention of my colleagues in the House of Representatives the achievements of the Sky View High School Marching Band of Cache County School District in Utah.

In 1964, Director John Manning came to Sky View and began the process of turning its band into one of the best in the State of Utah. When it was discovered Mr. Manning had multiple sclerosis, his daughter, Sheri, was asked to take over the band. Sheri changed the band from a traditional marching group to a corps style with a color guard which relies heavily on flags and rifles in their presentation. The band is very active in performing at parades in the spring and summer and at athletic events in the fall.

During the off-season, the band turns its interests to symphony and jazz band concerts and competitions. The band and color guard combined have won 96 trophies for the high school in the last 5 years.

Kirt Saville took over as director of the band at the beginning of the 1980-81 school year, and has continued the band's tradition of being the best and bringing home trophies. He says the band has a great amount of self-esteem and pride, with its motivation and discipline coming from within the group.

In the last 5 years, Sky View has entered 22 competitions and received first place in all but 2. The band has been invited this year to participate in the World's Fair in Tennessee and the 1982 Cherry Blossom Festival here in Washington, D.C.

The director is Mr. Kirt R. Saville, the color guard advisor is Ms. Lousie Baugh, the assistant advisor is Ms. Joann Packer, with special recognition to Mr. John P. Manning and Miss Sherilyn Manning.

POLISH SOLIDARITY DAY

HON. WM. S. BROOMFIELD

OF MICHIGAN

Friday, January 29, 1982

● Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, Sunday will mark the commemoration of Polish Solidarity Day. Our recognition of this event symbolizes the strong bonds between the American and Polish people, as well as our common desire to achieve freedom and individual liberty in Eastern Europe. By demonstrating our concern over the fate of Poland, we give faith to those millions of Poles oppressed by the Soviet Union and their agents within the Polish Government, while simultaneously putting the oppressors on notice that the world is watching and the oppressors will be held accountable for their actions.

The subjugation of the Solidarity Trade Union movement by Polish authorities and the jailing or killing of demonstrating Polish workers is a crime of historic proportions. While the courageous Polish people have often made historic stands against totalitarian forces, the confrontation today marks a momentous occurrence because it is their own government that is repressing the wishes of the Polish people. Let us not underestimate the magnitude of the conflict. Solidarity represents 10 million Polish workers. We can assume that at least an equal number of workers' adult family members support Solidarity.

The total population of Poland is only about 36 million people. Therefore, a probable majority of the population has clearly sided with Solidarity and supports the gains that were achieved under the Gdansk agreement. Yet despite this support for Solidarity, the Polish Communist leadership appears determined to undermine the agreement negotiated with Solidarity and to prevent any evolutionary change of the economic or political environment in Poland. I believe it would be useful to emphasize some basic truths in regard to the crackdown on Solidarity.

First, Solidarity did not bring about its own suppression by making outrageous demands and advocating anarchy. Communist apologists would have us believe the opposite. In fact, Solidarity leaders continually worked to halt wildcat strikes and to impose a disciplined approach to the negotiations with the government. Solidarity's efforts resulted in workers returning to their jobs and production rising even into the fall of 1981. Yet despite Solidarity's efforts to produce a stable situation and negotiate with the government in good faith, the Jaruzelski regime rejected the establishment of a meaningful dialog with the union and instead outlawed strikes, declared martial law, and imprisoned union leaders.

Second, it must be understood that the Soviet Union has already intervened in Poland. Not with troops, but with intimidation, threats, and directives to the Polish Communist leadership. Soviet and Warsaw Pact troop maneuvers constantly circled the Polish borders during the year preceding the crackdown. The Soviet Government, along with their Communist puppets in other Soviet Bloc countries, issued dire warnings to Solidarity to refrain from seeking an increased measure of freedom, and chastised the Polish Government for not crushing the Solidarity movement. The martial law decree was itself printed in September in the Soviet Union, not Poland. And finally, Soviet Marshal Kulikov, chief of the Warsaw Pact Forces, along with other senior Soviet military officers, was in Warsaw preceding the martial law decree and during the initial period following it. I believe that the record speaks for itself. The Soviet Union has deeply intervened in the Polish crisis.

Another point worth emphasizing is that the loss of liberty for the Polish people is no less egregious because it was taken away by Polish troops rather than Soviet troops. Many softliners would have us believe that we should be grateful that the Communist authorities did not resort to the use of Soviet troops. I find this line of thinking shallow and naive. The Soviet Union has trained all of the military and political leaders in Eastern Europe and controls every one of their armies through the Warsaw Pact alliance. The Soviet Union decided against using their own forces for the following reasons: First, there might have been serious resistance within Poland to Soviet troops; second because of threatended economic and political sanctions by the West; and third, because it would have negated its own propaganda among Western pacifist groups pushing unilateral disarmament by NATO. The Soviet military may yet use its own troops if the Polish Army cannot suppress the Polish people, but for the Polish patriot and freedom seeker, it makes little difference whether he is arrested and beaten by a Polish soldier or a Soviet soldier.

A final truth that must be mentioned is that this crisis is not an internal Polish affair. Because Poland and the Soviet Union signed the Helsinki Final Act of 1975, they are obligated to provide certain standards of freedom within their borders. They are clearly violating their obligations and therefore all other signatories have a right to criticize the situation and take appropriate measures.

As we commemorate Solidarity Day we must examine what the repression of Solidarity bodes for our future relationship with Soviet Bloc. The crackdown destabilizes the East-West political scene. Rather than letting events in Poland evolve in an acceptable manner between the people of Poland and their Government, the crackdown has repressed a movement that would make Government policy more responsive to the needs of its people. Responsiveness and accountability are, of course, the basis of our own governing philosophy. Therefore, a shift in the opposite direction in Poland only serves to heighten those differences between East and West. As a result, we find an increase in tensions between us as we demand that individual rights be respected by all countries, while the Soviet bloc proceeds to violate every precept of civilized international behavior and crush dissent within its borders.

Solidarity Day will not only send a message to the Polish people that we have not forgotten them during their time of struggle, but will serve to remind the Soviet Union that we will never accept totalitarianism under any guise. We will never tolerate a different standard of human rights behind the Iron Curtain than we would tolerate in the West. On this point we must be clear and we must be firm. Effective Red Army control over a country in no way diminishes our moral responsibility to demand fair treatment and liberty for the oppressed masses in Eastern Europe. Individual liberty is a right of all people in all parts of the world. While the Soviet bloc may from time to time drag out bogus arguments of coexistence and détente in an effort to purchase East-West peace at the cost of freedom in Eastern Europe, we must always remember what the great democracies of the West stand for. We must advocate our values and demand that others adhere to these universally recognized standards. If we falter in our effort, there can be no one else to carry the torch of liberty.●

GOOD WORDS ABOUT VETERANS HOSPITALS

HON. NEWT GINGRICH

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, January 29, 1982

● Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, there has been a great deal of criticism about the hospitals operated by the Veterans' Administration. William H. Gunn, a disabled veteran of World War II from Forest Park, Ga., recently sent me a copy of a letter he sent to U.S. News & World Report. I want to share with my colleagues his positive comments about the health care provided by the Veterans' Administration:

AUGUST 30, 1981.

U.S. NEWS & WORLD REPORT, INC.,
Washington, D.C.

SIRS: I am upset with articles published in two of your recent issues about the Veterans Hospitals. You only seemed to be concerned with those who were unhappy with the treatment they received, or did not receive, at VA hospitals.

I am a disabled veteran from World War II. I was wounded in combat and spent two years in an Army hospital. It was just in July of 1979 that I had to go into a VA hospital (Decatur, Georgia) and was a patient there until November 1980 in the orthopedic section. I spent about five months as an in-patient and the rest of the more than two years as an out-patient, reporting to the orthopedic clinic every week. As a patient, I was operated on four times and fitted with special shoes which enabled me to walk again in comfort.

During my stay there, I found all the doctors, nurses, ward help, ward secretary, volunteers and all the people in the different clinics, such as X-Ray and Brace Shop, to be very dedicated and highly concerned over every patient they had.

The doctors, as I'm sure you know, are supplied by Emory University Medical School, one of the finest in the country. They rotate doctors about every three months and I had some 25 doctors during my stay. Not one of them was anything but excellent, in my case as well as dozens of others that I observed. They visited me each day, takled with me about my condition and kept me informed about what they intended to do.

The nurses were Great. They worked every minute of their shift with their patients and not one time did I hear any one of them complain or mistreat a single patient.

Now, I don't have the figures, so I'll say that the VA hospitals treat tens of thousands of veterans. Out of that number of patients there is going to be a few who are unhappy, just as there are in private hospitals. But, I also know from being there, that there are a good many veterans that have a very bad attitude and feel as though they know more than the doctors and try to tell the doctors what to do and how to do it. These veterans raise hell with the nurses over such things as meals being 15 minutes late and not answering their buzzers immediately. In general, they have large chips on their shoulders and want to be bowed to. You know, 95% of these veterans are the very ones that complain that the VA hospital doesn't do anything for them.

There is nothing wrong with the Veterans Hospital in Decatur, Georgia. In my opinion, all the people here do a fantastic job. Sure, some veterans have to wait a while to be examined for admission or to receive outpatient treatment, but the simple fact is that they are not the only veteran that need attention so they have to wait their turn. Have you been in a private doctor's office lately?

Again, I am very upset that your magazine would publish only the one side of the story. For every unhappy veteran, I'm sure there are hundreds that really appreciate what they are doing. I know I do.

I subscribe to your magazine and now I'm wondering if all your articles are as one-sided as this one.

I thank God that this is America. Sure we have problems, but they are outweighed by all the great things we have. I just wonder what kind of treatment the veterans from other countries get. We have so many things to be thankful for and one of them is the veterans hospitals. I know, I've been there.

VOTING RECORD OF MORRIS K. UDALL

HON. MORRIS K. UDALL

OF ARIZONA

Friday, January 29, 1982

● Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, it has become my practice from time to time to list my votes in the House of Representatives here in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I strongly believe that the people of southern Arizona have the right to know where I stand on the issues decided by the House, and I have found that printing my record here is the best way to provide that information.

This is not an all-inclusive list. I have omitted noncontroversial votes such as quorum calls, motions to resolve into the Committee of the Whole House, and motions to approve the Journal of the previous day.

The descriptions are necessarily somewhat short, and I am sure that some of my constituents will have additional questions about the issues described here. So I invite them to write me for specifics, or to visit my district office at 300 North Main, Tucson.

The list is arranged as follows:

KEY

1. Official rollcall number;

2. Number of the bill or resolution;
3. Title of the bill or resolution;
4. A description of issue being voted on;
5. The date of the action;
6. My vote, in the form Y=yes, N=no, and NV=not voting;

● Mr. McHUGH. Mr. Speaker, at this time when we observe the anniversary of the Ukraine's independence, I am proud to join in saluting the people of the Ukraine. Early in this fateful century, they showed the world what it is to hunger and thrist after the justice that is expressed in national self-determination and personal freedom; today, they continue to remind us that freedom is never safeguarded without devotion and sacrifice.

The Ukrainian people have fought for freedom not only literally, against the armed military might of the Kremlin, but also spiritually and morally in ways that have touched the lives of freedom-loving peoples everywhere. Both in their homeland and throughout the free world, including our own United States, the Ukrainian people have nurtured freedom for all of us by cherishing and nurturing their own heritage—their language, customs, religious heritage, and cultural riches expressed in art, music, dance, and other cultural forms.

Theirs is a community which celebrates freedom despite the anguish of having their homeland enslaved. Their active faith in the restoration of their own country's freedom inspires us all to greater devotion to the survival of liberty wherever it is threatened, and to enhance it where it now flourishes.

Mr. Speaker, during this year's observance of the Ukrainian people's right to be free, we are met upon an urgent hour. The suppression in Poland of the people's routine rights of self-expression reminds us that the earlier Soviet aggression in Afghanistan was indeed part of an all-too-familiary pattern of Soviet subjugation and oppression. That pattern is infamously recorded in the suffering not only of the Ukrainian people, but of peoples throughout Eastern Europe. Indeed, we are grimly reminded that John Kennedy's description—20 years ago this month—of the "long twilight struggle" between the Soviet Union and the free world remains our greatest foreign policy challenge.

It is a fitting time, at the beginning of this legislative year, for all of us to notice how precarious the survival of freedom is throughout the world—to notice that, whenever freedom is threatened anywhere, it is as though it were my brother's barn that is burning. For the Ukrainians and other oppressed peoples have taught us never to take freedom for granted. And they continue to teach us that, as we must justly rejoice in Thomas Jefferson's proud sentiment—"Where freedom is, there is my country"—we also have the sacred responsibility of acting upon Thomas Paine's magnificent reply: "Where freedom is not, there is my country."●

FARM BUREAU GIVES YOU MORE

HON. BILL EMERSON

OF MISSOURI

Friday, January 29, 1982

● Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, during the congressional recess I had the privilege of attending the 1981 annual convention of the Missouri Farm Bureau Federation at Tan-Tara Lodge in Osage, Mo.

During the convention many of Missouri's young future farmers presented speeches. The first place winner of the speech contest was an active member of the Future Farmers of America, Delta R-V Chapter, my constitutent, Mr. Robbie McManus of Chaffee, Mo.

I am pleased to share with my colleagues his outstanding speech entitled, "Farm Bureau Gives You More." In it he makes some salient comments about problems in agriculture, but his message is basically one of optimism for the future of agriculture. He extols a great farm organization, the Missouri Farm Bureau Federation, and commits himself to a career in agriculture. Herewith, Mr. McManus' remarks:

FARM BUREAU GIVES YOU MORE

Today's economy has caused the American citizen to stop and figure his budget closely, to cut where possible, and to pull the purse strings tighter. The farmer has been no exception to this situation as he closes his record books for the year to find he has more expenditures and less realized net profit than he has had in the previous years. However, today's farmer along with the Future Farmer of America have become aware that there is an organization that can help their budget deficits. This organization is the Farm Bureau which also has 28 plus services to offer its members. The Farm Bureau is "The World's largest general farm organization." It is "The Voice for Agriculture."[1]

The Missouri Farm Bureau, as we know it today, has come to us through years of dedication, determination, and hours of planning by its members and leaders. It was through the efforts of that small group of far-sighted individuals who met on March 24 and 25 in 1915 at Slater, Missouri, that the Farm Bureau was born.[2] Today, 66 years later, the Farm Bureau is the largest general farm organization in the State of Missouri. Its membership is composed of 78,000 families with the State headquarters in Jefferson City, Missouri.[3]

The Missouri Farm Bureau is a part of the American Farm Bureau which is composed of 3,000,000 families in 48 of the 50 states and Puerto Rico.[4] The voice of the smallest farmer to the largest farmer, in any facet of agriculture, can be heard throughout the organization of the Farm Bureau. Personal ideas are heard on the county level, and if feasible carried to the state level. Then likewise to the national level where ideas develop into resolutions and bills. That is the reason that three out of four farmers that belong to a farming organization, belong to Farm Bureau.[5] These America Farm Bureau headquarters are located in Chicago, Illinois, with an additional office in Washington, D.C.[6]

For the next few minutes, I would like to share with you what I feel are the three outstanding characteristics of the Farm Bureau that offers more for less.

First, the Farm Bureau is a powerful legislative machine. Legislation today is of great importance to the farmer, perhaps, even greater than ever before. Before a bill becomes a law, it must travel a long circuitious route. Mortality rates are exceedingly high. Many never survive the first committee.[7] This year on June 15, when the Missouri 81st General Assembly closed its first regular session, there had been 1,433 bills and resolutions introduced. Out of this number of bills introduced only 163 passed. The Farm Bureau, however experienced a very productive session. Laws affecting personal property tax, truck weight and length, taxes on Blue Cross-Blue Shield premiums, and grain and ware-house receipts are to name but a few of the laws signed by the governor that affects the farmer. Having a voice this strong in the legislature of our state is of great importance to me as a future farmer. Since agriculture is only 4% of the total population, we must have a sound system to uphold those laws we feel are right. At the same time, we must have a system strong enough to fight those laws which we feel may be detrimental to us in the future.

The second characteristic of the Farm Bureau is that it is an outstanding educational tool. The 28 plus services offered are services that have been tried and proven and come to us through research and knowledge of its leaders. These services are available to the farmer regardless of his age or financial status. Financing for property and vehicles are available at low interest cost. Grain and market lines give the producer the latest top prices for his crops and livestock. Accurate record keeping systems and safety programs sponsored by Farm Bureau will save the farmer thousands of dollars each year. Free ads, shopper's guides, discount pharmaceuticals, travel tours and other discount attractions are areas of interest to the lady of the most "noble occupation", the farmer's wife. In a day when education is the key to successful farming, I find the Farm Bureau offers many services and educational information to the farm family, again at a very low cost.

Last, but not least, the Farm Bureau was built on a solid foundation. It is a foundation that has, is, and will endure through the future years. The Farm Bureau has placed the farmer's church as the number one priority for his life. I, too, feel this is right as man is made in the image of God.[8] No other occupation brings man closer to his creator and those things created for man than does farming. I find that through farming, man creates a closeness to God that will sustain his spiritual needs whatever they may be.

The farmer today has many new problems such as land use planning, chemical control, and restrictions from the government. However, I strongly believe the Farm Bureau, as in the past, will always be there fighting for the farmer's rights and helping him to conquer his problems at a very low cost. Good relationships between farmer and farmer, farmers and business men, and farmers and consumers have been a direct product of the Farm Bureau. Faulty and misunderstood relations in business prove very costly. The same is true in farming. The Farm Bureau saves the farmer large sums of money by creating good relationships.

As I look at the three strong characteristics of the Farm Bureau, I am reminded of the "Primary aims of the Future Farmers of America," according to the official manual, that stresses the development of agriculture leadership, cooperation, and citizenship."[9] When these aims and the characteristics of the Farm Bureau are developed by a future farmer, I see an individual that will be an asset to his community, to his state, and to his country.

In closing, I wish to express my appreciation to those leaders of the Missouri Farm Bureau, as well as, those of The American Farm Bureau who have worked long tiring hours to bring to us the organization that we have today. My 86 year 'young' Grandfather who has been a member of Farm Bureau for four decades, recently summed up my thoughts when he said, "Son, this is "The Organization" for you in the future." In completing my research for this speech, I do firmly agree with my grandfather: "Farm Bureau Is the Organization" and it will give me, along with other Future Farmers, more for less as we begin our career in farming!●

KIM DAE JUNG

HON. JAMES L. OBERSTAR

OF MINNESOTA

Friday, January 29, 1982

● Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Speaker, 1 year ago, on January 23, 1981, the Supreme Court of the Republic of Korea upheld the death sentence imposed on opposition political leader Kim Dae Jung. Many Members of this House, as well as President Reagan, joined in the appeal to save Mr. Kim's life, which resulted in the commutation of his death sentence to life imprisonment.

Mr. Kim, however, remains in solitary confinement in prison. His crime: Adherence to democratic principles, and his insistence upon his right to oppose democratically the militaristic Park and Chun regimes.

President Reagan has expressed satisfaction with the process of quiet diplomacy through which he interceded last year on behalf of Kim Dae Jung. A year later, however, we cannot accept the fact that the only result of this quiet diplomacy will be that Kim Dae Jung spends the rest of his life in prison for a crime of which every Member of this body is guilty—exercise of the right to oppose, democratically, the administration in power.

In December, shortly before Christmas, 25 Members of this House joined with the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. LEACH), and me in an appeal to President Chun Doo Hwan asking that Kim Dae Jung and his codefendants be released in the traditional end-of-year amnesty. Copies of our letter were sent to the Korean Ambassador to the United States and to the State Department. We have received no response from the government of Chun Doo Hwan.

I am deeply disappointed that the Government has not officially acknowledged a bipartisan appeal of 27 U.S. House Members deeply concerned about the future of democracy in Korea and the future of U.S. relations with the Chun government.

I hope that in the next few weeks, the Government of South Korea will announce that it will free Kim Dae Jung.●

UKRAINIAN INDEPENDENCE

HON. DON RITTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. RITTER. Mr. Speaker, this year marks the 64th anniversary of Ukrainian Independence Day. Each year Ukrainians around the world celebrate this day and look forward to the day when Ukraine will be a free and independent nation.

On January 28, 1982, Ukrainians from all over the United States came to Washington to participate in ceremonies commemorating their independence day. I am enclosing a copy of my statement which was read at the independence day celebration in the Dirksen Senate Office Building by Mr. Theodore Caryk.

The statement follows:

DEAR FRIENDS: Vid vs'oho sertsia ia khochu vitaty vas tut na sviatkuvanni shist'-desiat chetvertoi richnytsi vidrodzhennia Ukrains'koi derzhavy.

With all my heart, I would like to welcome you to the 64th anniversary celebration of Ukrainian Independence Day.

I would like to express my deep regret for being unable to attend this celebration of the 64th anniversary of Ukrainian Independence Day. Your gathering today demonstrates that Soviet repression can never crush the spirit and determination of the great Ukrainian nation.

Along with the celebration of Ukrainian Independence day, today we also recognize the strength of Ukrainian people, a strength that permeates this very room. We recognize the fortitude of Ukrainians, fortitude that allows individuals to stand up to Soviet terror. We recognize the perseverance of Ukrainians to keep alive the creative forces of religion, language, and culture . . . creative forces worldwide which will serve as the seeds in the blossoming of a free Ukrainian nation. And we recognize Ukrainian nationalism and the striving toward self-determination which no amount of pounding by Red Army and KGB jackboots can crush. Let Mr. Brezhnev know that each kick creates an even greater love and dedication to a free Ukraine. My friends, your strength lies in your belief in freedom and in your homeland. It is a feeling none of us will ever let die.

Over the past year, we have seen the power of nationalism and self-determination at work in Poland and Afghanistan. In Afghanistan, people armed with weapons that were used 100 years ago to drive the British from their country are now being used to combat their modern day colonizers. In Poland, we see a country again resisting its oppressors and fighting for greater freedom. So very much of Poland's struggle is the struggle of Ukraine, and so much of Ukraine's struggle affects Poland. So much of the Afghan people's struggle is the struggle of Ukrainian and Polish peoples . . . and so it is with the struggle of the Baltics, Slovaks, Czechs, Hungarians and so on down a very long line. Whether you are from Ukraine, Poland, Hungary, Czechoslovakia, or Afghanistan, we are all bloodbrothers against Soviet imperial domination. The sharpest sickle and heaviest hammer won't change that and never will.

So as we gather tonight, and as we look upon a new year of hope, let us not forget those who have given up what little freedom they had so that their countrymen might have greater freedom. I speak of the Rudenkos, the Berdnyks, the Lesivs, the Sichkos, and all the other so called "dissidents" who are in Soviet prisons. And as we think of them, let me remind you of what our friend and great Ukrainian patriot General Petro Grigorenko, said last November before the Helsinki hearing on Ukraine. "There is a growing anger among the people, among the nations which will rise up to the Soviet leaders."

Khai boh blahoslovyt' vsikh vas! Khai zhyve vil'na Ukraina! May God bless all of You! May long live a free Ukraine!

EDUARDO FREI MONTALVA—LATIN AMERICAN DEMOCRAT

HON. MICHAEL D. BARNES

OF MARYLAND

Friday, January 29, 1982

● Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, I wish to join the Washington Post, whose editorial follows my remarks, in paying tribute to Eduardo Frei Montalva, Chile's second-to-last democratically elected President, who died last week in Santiago. His passing reminds us how few democratic leaders of his stature are left in Latin America. And his passing reminds us of something else as well: contrary to what we once thought, in Chile as elsewhere in Latin America, democracy's coffin has been nailed shut by the right, not the left. History is replete with cases where the unintended consequences of a policy are worse than what the policy was designed to prevent. It is clear in restrospect that the left has not been the threat to democracy in Latin America that the right, which we strengthened to fight the left, has turned out to be. It is a lesson we should keep in mind as we struggle to cope with the collapse of the legacy of Latin America's Eduardo Freis.

[From the Washington Post, Jan. 26, 1982]

EDUARDO FREI MONTALVA

Eduardo Frei was widely regarded as the "last best hope" for Latin democracy during the years 1964-70, when he was president of Chile. It was a pardonable exaggeration. The Cuban revolution had imparted a double sense that the hemisphere was moving leftward and that the United States had a major interest in checking the flow. Chile then enjoyed a reputation as the primier Latin democracy, and Edurado Frei was seen, in Chile and the United States, as the sort of able, principled democratic reformer who could erect a "firebreak" on the left and keep the radicals on the other side.

Founder of his country's Christian Democratic Party, Mr. Frei had pronounced himself "staggered by the differences in economic strata" in Chile. He took office in 1964 with the only absolute majority any Chilean presidential candidate has enjoyed. Whether he knew of the secret funds that, it turned out later, the CIA put into his campaign was never established. Whether he needed such support was dubious. In any event, with a good deal of public American backing, he proclaimed a "revolution in liberty" entailing agrarian reform, nationalization of copper mines and income redistribution. He was serious, but by the time he finished his single constitutionally allowable six-year term, he had whetted popular appetites for considerably more progress than he had been able to deliver.

Marxist Salvador Allende received a plurality of the popular vote in 1970, and on the right in Chile there were elements opposed to letting him take office. At various times some of those elements had received CIA encouragement, but, with Mr. Frei lending his prestige to a constitutional succession, Mr. Allende was seated. Within barely a year, Chile was exploding into class war. Mr. Frei ran for the Senate in 1973 to continue the fight by parliamentary means, but even he could not slow the disintegration. In September, the generals made a coup whose dark result Mr. Frei bravely contested until he died at age 70 in Santiago last Friday. He was a man of true honor, which is much more than can be said for any of the people who have ruled Chile, and abused Chile, since his time.●

IN TRIBUTE TO THE HONORABLE RICHARD BOLLING

HON. DAN ROSTENKOWSKI

OF ILLINOIS

Thursday, January 28, 1982

● Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join my colleagues in appreciation for the contributions of the Honorable RICHARD BOLLING.

I have served with my good friend, DICK BOLLING, for almost 24 years. During this period my own legislative expertise has grown to a great extent because of the "old professor," the gentleman from Missouri. In some respects the student did not always agree with the professor. This was particularly true when we were on opposite sides of elections to decide the House leadership. While not always on the same side, we both had the best interests of this institution at heart.

As many of my colleagues know, DICK has written two of the better books on the House of Representatives. One is "Power in the House"—a title a future historian could very well use to describe DICK BOLLING's tenure in this Chamber.

I am confident that there is not a single Member of this body who does not regard DICK BOLLING as a man of superior intellect with a strong commitment to excellence. And while we all know him as the strong and effective chairman of the Rules Committee, there is also a human side to DICK BOLLING. This very human side of the gentleman from Missouri came forward during one of the most difficult periods of my career, the 1981 fight over the tax bill. During that legislative battle I went to his office to discuss the rule to accompany the tax measure. In a very considerate way, DICK not only put me at ease, but through his keen mind provided me additional perspective on the upcoming challenge. I will always be grateful for his understanding manner during that arduous period.

Mr. Speaker, DICK BOLLING's vigorous style and effective leadership will be missed by this Chamber.●

NEW INDUSTRY PROVIDES INCREASED USES FOR HOME COMPUTERS

HON. NEWT GINGRICH

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, January 29, 1982

● Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, new private companies are springing up to provide the home computer user with many new uses of for his or her investments. These companies offer central data bases that home computer users can tap by simply dialing the telephone, just for a small monthly charge.

An article in Time magazine in the October 26, 1981, issue concludes by saying:

It seems that people are becoming increasingly hungry for the information wizardry that computers are bringing about, especially now that the magic can be brought right into the home.

The home use of computers is a new opportunity for families for work and learn together. That's why I want to share this article with you and my colleagues to explain these increased uses of this new technology.

The article follows:

[From Time magazine, Oct. 26, 1981]

MAY THE SOURCE BE WITH YOU

(By Christopher Byron)

For most families, household utilities usually mean electricity, the heating system and a supply of fresh water. But when middle-income New Yorkers next month begin moving into a newly completed 52-unit condominium at 260 West Broadway in Manhattan's Tribeca district, they will find not just sinks, tubs and electrical outlets, but builder-installed computer terminals. The inconspicuous machines, which look like small television sets with a keyboard, are hooked up to a McLean, Va., firm that styles itself an "information utility." Its daunting name: the Source.

The Source and its 12,000 nationwide customers are part of the still small, but explosively growing, new business of consumer data banks. For fees that can amount to as little as a few cents a month, the data banks are using computer technology and telephone lines to provide household subscribers with the opportunity to summon up-to-the-minute information on everything from the action on Wall Street to the best shopping bargains available from brand-name discount houses around the country.

For years major corporations have earned extra income by marketing the sort of research and scientific information that routinely get produced and then filed away in the normal course of business. Data banks buy the information, put it in their own computers and then resell it either to other corporations or perhaps to large research institutes.

One such bank, DIALOG Information Services Inc. of Palo Alto, Calif., buys reports, statistics and doctoral dissertations from some 140 different corporations, universities and even the government. When using the service, a subscriber dials a toll-free 800 number and connects his telephone receiver to a coupler device that links his office computer to the DIALOG computer. He can then transmit queries and receive the answers within seconds. Cost for such services can run as high as $300 an hour, a sum that businesses can afford much more readily then the average individual can.

But the mushrooming popularity of personal computers has now begun to spur the development of data banks specially tailored for individual consumers. The Source, which is a subsidiary of Reader's Digest, offers subscribers everything from financial planning to word processing. Source subscribers can monitor the schedule of current legislative activities in the Congress, check the latest changes in airline schedules and send "electronic mail" to other subscribers by using Source computers as a kind of space-age postal system. Gerald Reinen, a Massachusetts business consultant, reports that not only does he use the Source for business applications at the office but his children use it at home when they want to look up movie reviews.

Another consumer data bank, CompuServe Inc., of Columbus, offers electronic copies of stories in ten major national newspapers, including the Washington Post and the New York Times on the same day that the newspapers hit the stands. Also available is current news from the Associated Press wire service. Through its Microquote data base. CompuServe provides constantly updated information on any of more than 40,000 different stocks, bonds and commodities.

Prices are not cheap. The Source charges customers a one-time sign-up fee of $100, plus a monthly minimum of $10, whether the system is used or not. Additional "on-line" fees can be anywhere from $4.25 to $30 an hour, depending upon the time of day and the nature of the information requested. CompuServe requires an initial sign-up fee of $19.95, but fees for on-line usage during business hours are higher than the Source's.

Before he can communicate with a data bank, a subscriber need either a personal computer, which can cost anywhere from $1,500 to $8,000, or one of the much less expensive electronic keyboards that retail in hobby shops for under $400. There is a serious drawback to the keyboards, though. While cheaper to buy, they often wind up being more expensive to use. Reason: keyboards lack computer memory power, and thus can communicate with data banks only at the pace of the human typing information into the machine, which is fairly slow by computer standards.

In contrast, personal computers can be preprogrammed to ask questions before they are ever connected to data banks. Moreover, once connected, via a toll-free call over a household telephone line, the personal computers can transmit requests for data at superfast speeds. This can cut a subscriber's on-line usage from hours to minutes, or even seconds, at a time, resulting in huge savings in monthly bills. Says Marshall Graham, president of the Source: "Our equipment is constantly in operation, but the average bill to our customers is no more than about $25 per month."

Though total subscribers to both the Source and CompuServe now number fewer than 27,000, the Source alone expects to have 20 times that many oneline customers within three years. Meanwhile, a number of our companies, including CBS, Warner Amex, Cox Broadcasting and Time Inc., are working to bring similar services into the home via so-called interactive cable-television systems. Such systems would use a television cable instead of a telephone line to transmit the data, and permit viewers to extract information by means of specially modified television sets equipped with keyboards. Tests are now under way with cable subscribers in San Diego, Columbus, Dallas and elsewhere. Whatever the actual transmission technology, it seems that people are becoming increasingly hungry for the information wizardry that computers are bringing about, especially now that the magic can be brought right into the home.●

THE REAL F. D. R. LEGACY

HON. MORRIS K. UDALL

OF ARIZONA

Thursday, January 28, 1982

● Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, Franklin Delano Roosevelt shall long be remembered for his stewardship of the Nation during the Great Depression and his leadership during World War II, but the real F. D. R. legacy is a more lasting one. In his 13 years as the Nation's Chief Executive, he established a tradition of political activism, elevated our sense of social concern, and enacted a series of wide-ranging reforms designed to insure the financial security of millions of Americans.

Roosevelt's predecessor in office, Herbert Hoover, once remarked during his term of office that, "the sole function of government is to bring about a condition of affairs favorable to the beneficial development of private enterprise." Roosevelt's philosophy of government admitted no such limited vision of government's role in our lives. He saw that while government and the role it plays in our lives must necessarily be limited, the institutions of government must also act from time to time to preserve human freedoms and economic security. In times of great economic difficulty, it is not enough for government to be an idle caretaker; government must move aggressively to start the wheels of commerce turning again. When the Nation's new President took office on March 4, 1933, banks across the country were closed. Two days later, F. D. R. declared a bank holiday; on March 9, he forwarded emergency banking legislation to Congress. With swift congressional approval, the Nation's banks were open again for business within 6 days.

Throughout his years in office, F. D. R.'s overriding concern was social justice and progress. Seeing "one-third of a nation ill-housed, ill-clad, and ill-nourished," he offered the country a New Deal. Seeing millions of American laborers out of work, he created the Public Works Administration, putting much of that labor back to work building a legacy of schools, highways, sewers, and airports. Seeing an all-but-idle residential construction industry, he established the Federal Housing Administration, an institution whose valuable work continues even today. Near the end of his administration, he looked at his record and said, "The test of our progress is not whether we add more to the abundance of those who have much, it is whether we provide enough for those who have too little."

Finally, F. D. R. brought a measure of economic security to the Nation that we not take for granted. Having witnessed the specter of millions of elderly Americans unable to provide for their basic needs, he secured passage of the Social Security Act of 1935. Having seen the ravages of unemployment, he sought and secured congressional approval of unemployment compensation legislation. Having watched as millions of Americans lost their savings in the closing of banks, he fought for the creation of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation to insure depositor's accounts.

While acting to secure the financial status of individual Americans, he also acted to bring a greater degree of security and stability to financial institutions. The Glass-Steagall Act of 1933 increased the powers of the Federal Reserve Banks to regulate member banks, including the power to restrict the extension of credit for market speculation. The Securities and Exchange Act of 1934 provided protection against securities fraud.

Taken as a whole, these measures and others approved by Congress during F. D. R.'s term have served to bring a heretofore unknown measure of economic stability. Prior to the Great Depression, depressions of near comparable levels occured nearly every 20 years in this country. Thanks in part to many of the measures adopted during F. D. R.'s term of office, the severity of economic downturns has never again approached the severity of the Great Depression.

Embodied in all his efforts was his relentless "can do" spirit. He recognized, however, the imperfections of policymaking and consequently saw the need to alter policies when they failed. He once remarked with modesty, "We do our best that we know how at the moment and if it does not turn out, we modify it." That is the real F. D. R. legacy.

Many of the programs adopted during the New Deal were appropriate to their times, but inappropriate to ours. The real F. D. R. legacy, however, is a lasting one. On this day, his centenary, the Nation owes him a great debt.●

NO NEW WITHHOLDING TAX ON INTEREST AND DIVIDENDS

HON. NORMAN E. D'AMOURS

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

Friday, January 29, 1982

● Mr. D'AMOURS. Mr. Speaker, the President has proposed instituting a new 5-percent withholding tax on interest and dividend earnings. This is not a new proposal. A similar effort was made by President Carter and was wisely and resoundingly defeated in the 96th Congress. The House voted by the overwhelming bipartisan majority of 401 to 4 to reject the Carter proposal on August 19, 1980.

I urge my colleagues to once again reject this ill-considered initiative which will obstruct efforts to achieve an economic recovery. Members who wish to voice their objection to this proposal may join me in cosponsoring a sense of the Congress resolution, House Concurrent Resolution 255, which spells out why this is not a good idea and why it should be defeated.

The text of the resolution follows:

H. CON. RES. 255

Whereas a 5-percent withholding tax on interest and dividends will severely hamper national efforts to increase productivity through increased savings and investment; and

Whereas it will impede capital formation and exert upward pressure on interest rates which are already restraining business expansion and damaging small businesses, housing, the automobile industry and agriculture; and

Whereas it will reverse the progress made by the savings and investment incentives contained in the Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981; and

Whereas it will impose substantial and expensive new regulatory and paperwork burdens on financial institutions, businesses, brokerage firms, and the federal government, while generating very little new revenue, and

Whereas similar proposals have twice been resoundingly defeated by previous Congresses: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That it is the sense of the Congress that no new withholding tax should be imposed on interest and dividends.

Members who wish to cosponsor House Concurrent Resolution 255 should contact Mike Radway or Jeff Lawrence at 5-5456.●

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

HON. EDWIN B. FORSYTHE

OF NEW JERSEY

Friday, January 29, 1982

● Mr. FORSYTHE. Mr. Speaker, last November, I attended the International Convention for the Conservation of Atlantic Tunas as a member of the official U.S. negotiating team. Consequently, I was not present for votes on the floor of the House from Thursday, November 12 through Wednesday, November 18, 1981. I would like to take this opportunity to state for the record my position on record votes No. 295 through No. 320.

On record vote No. 295, a motion to approve the Journal of Tuesday, November 10, I would have voted "nay."

On record vote No. 296, a motion to exclude the public from meetings of the conference committee on H.R. 3413, the Department of Energy National Security Authorization, I would have voted "aye."

On record vote No. 297, a motion to recommit the conference report on H.R. 4035, Interior Department appropriations for fiscal year 1982, I would have voted "aye."

On record vote No. 298, a motion to approve the Journal of Friday, November 13, I would have voted "nay."

On record vote No. 299, a motion to order the previous question on the resolution (H. Res. 271) providing for floor consideration of House Joint Resolution 357, continuing appropriations, fiscal 1982, I would have voted "nay."

THE HUMAN COST OF POLITICAL ASSASSINATIONS

HON. MICHAEL D. BARNES

OF MARYLAND

Friday, January 29, 1982

● Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, although we all receive hundreds of letters daily, once in a while I like to take the opportunity to single one out that carries a very important message. On this occasion I would like to share with my colleagues a copy of a letter to the editors of several newspapers I received from Robert E. Lutz on the murder of his friend, Mario Dary Rivera, in Guatemala. Although Mr. Rivera's death is just one of the thousands of murders that occur in Guatemala each year, Mr. Lutz reminds us of the human dimension of this tragedy. Mr. Lutz describes his friend as a good, decent, and peaceful man; the president of a university, a nationally recognized figure. All too frequently, as we look at the larger picture of violence in Guatemala, in Central America, and all around the world, we forget that we are talking about human beings, with families, with jobs, making contributions to their societies. We should all listen to Mr. Lutz' warning:

In these days of political assassinations, i.e., the commission of murders vaguely justified by "politics," one can become aloof and insensitive to the real human costs and pain caused.

The article follows:

In these days of political assassinations, i.e., the commission of murders vaguely justified by "politics," one can become aloof and insensitive to the real human costs and pain caused. The tension and violence in the world somehow make it easy to abstract the message of the individual case. The murdered becomes just another of many.

Every once in a while the senselessness of this slaughter strikes home when an admired world statesman or friend is the victim, and then one thinks of the dead's loved ones, his contributions and the work left undone, the terrible waste!

A friend of mine was the victim the other day and I deeply mourn his untimely and senseless death. Mario Dary Rivera, a good, decent and peaceful man, was machine-gunned down as he was parking his car outside his office at San Carlos National University in Guatemala City. Mario was Rector of the University (viz., President of the University) and had served in that position for about a year to ensure its survival in this troubled land. He was not a political person who sided with the left or right, but a patriot who loved his university and country and knew the survival of both demanded enlightened leadership. A botanist by training, Mario had been director of the University's botanical garden prior to his ascent to Rector, and had established a nature reserve in the countryside which preserved some of the most unique flora and fauna in this beautiful country in order for present and future generations to appreciate, study and learn.

It is an all too frequent irony that "politics" of uncertain ideology violently takes from this world a person who loves life and its beauty, depriving us all of his wisdom and vision. Individuals like Mario Dary do make a difference, but little can protect them from those who consider life cheap and hide behind cowardly weapons to do their heinous deeds. Perhaps the phrase with which Mario always signed his letters is a fitting epitaph for him in death as it was a motto during his life: "id y ensenad a todos" (go forth and teach everyone).

Obedience to it will not destroy lives; it can save them . . . and nations too.

DO WE WANT OUR WOMEN IN COMBAT?

HON. LARRY McDONALD

OF GEORGIA

Friday, January 29, 1982

● Mr. McDONALD. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I shared with my colleagues parts I and II of 3 days of articles that appeared in the Washington Star on the successive days of January 9, 10, and 11, 1980, on the role of women in combat. John Fialka, the author of those articles, in concluding yesterday's section introduced a second and longer test of women in combat roles, called Braveshield, that would take place in the Mojave Desert in July 1977.

Again we witness the brazen practice of attempting to totally degrade feminine loveliness to the practice reality of combat conditions in the field. The record proves that women do not want, and should not get any role in a combat environment. As I have stated repeatedly, this is not to take away from the role that women can and do perform outstandingly in the military. But above all, and I think I can state this for most of my colleagues, we want our men to be men, and our women to be women. I hope that the Armed Forces by order of the Commander In Chief, rescind the attempt currently underway, to bring our ladies to the battlefield.

With these comments in mind, I share with my colleagues today, the conclusion of John Fialka's articles from the Washington Star:

[From the Washington Star, Jan. 10, 1980]

Again, there was an air of unreality among the women, who continued to wear makeup, put up their hair and complain about the lack of privacy and sanitary facilities for several weeks.

"Many of the troops, particularly the women, had not thought it through to the realization that had it been a war, both male and female soldiers could have been killed or wounded, or that they could have killed or wounded enemy soldiers," the report adds.

"There was no evidence that the presence of women created any serious social problems," the report says. "It was known that sexual intercourse was occurring, but not more than occurs in garrison."

In September the Army staged a third exercise, "REF-WAC 77," which was held in the midst of a larger NATO war game in the hilly, forested country south of Stuttgart, Germany.

"Leadership and management problems were widespread among the units," the REF-WAC report states. On two occasions women in charge of servicing generators supporting communications gear refused to do so because they were afraid to go out in the field at night.

A major reason for their fear, according to sociologist Nehama Babin, was the prospect of being raped.

Within a woman's own unit, she explained, a "sibling relationship" developed and the men would protect the women from abuse.

But other units, especially all male combat units moving through the area where the women were posted, were a big problem for the women.

Psychologist Johnson remembers one company commander who had to send his male soldiers out to rescue females posted on guard duty when "friendly" infantry units were passing through.

"The infantry thought it was great fun to stalk the female guards of support units because everybody knows they didn't have live ammunition." The only people with live ammunition in war games are the finance officers.

Despite the fear, and despite problems with womens' uniforms which proved to be ill-suited for field exercises, REF-WAC showed that support units with women in them could perform their specialities during extended field exercises.

The other researchers believe, however, that the exercise raised more questions than it answered.

NEW TESTS DELAYED

The Army Research Institute is working up a new set of exercises. They are designed to test the belief that in a sustained battle, support units may have to provide male replacements for the front lines, leaving them with large percentages of females.

The new tests will show how combat support units made up of 50 and 100 percent women can function. However, for a number of reasons the Army does not plan to conduct them until 1982.

One reason is that the Army is waiting for better-trained women and other equipment for them to use.

The results of REF-WAS and MAX-WAC have produced a large number of changes, including integrated "unisex" combat training for support units to assure that the women get the same training as the men. New field equipment is being prepared for women to offset the cold and the blisters they experienced during REF-WAC.

Another reason is that the House Appropriations Committee issued a report last year asking the Army to stop doing studies dealing with the enhancement of military job opportunities for women. "We kept raising questions about it, but we never seem to be getting any answers," complained one committee defense specialist.

Dr. Charles C. Moskos Jr., a sociologist at Northwestern University and author of the "American Enlisted Man," suspects there may be a third reason:

"The secretary of the Army (Clifford L. Alexander) is so hot on getting women into all kinds of tasks that it is very hard to find anything suggesting that there may be some things that women aren't suited for," Moskos says.

PRESSURE FROM THE TOP

Moskos sees the problem as a conundrum, one that will give politicians and military leaders a great deal of difficulty in the months to come. If there are some jobs that women cannot perform in combat-related units, he asserts, "it is unfair to the men in it to ask them to do it."

As for Alexander, he is weary of studies. "The farther you get from the Washington study atmosphere, the less you run into problems," he said.

"If you get a little too close here you get a whole lot of studies, the statistics we've been discussing and so on. You could probably fill this whole room with studies about women in the Army," he said, referring to his cavernous office in the Pentagon.

"Women have acquitted themselves well in wars. They will acquit themselves well in the future. Americans always have."

WOMEN IN THE ARMED SERVICES—PART III

(By John Fialka)

DESIGN PROBLEMS FOUND WIDESPREAD

ABERDEEN, MD.—A special unit of 30 women is about to go through field exercises here, slogging through the winter fog and mud carrying their M-16 rifles and other combat gear. For the Army, they represent the future.

They will be testing the new "unisex" helmet, made from Kevlar, a tough plastic-like substance designed by computers to fit female heads as well as men's. Four sizes will fit the whole Army.

They will have the new "unisex" combat boot, sized to fit women's higher instep, and the new Army body armor, which has a roomier bosom in the smaller sizes.

There also is the new Army field pack, an ingenious device with straps that curve out and do not cross over the breast area. They will have the "unisex" gas masks, designed by computer to make a tight fit with women's narrower faces.

They will be wearing the new generation of combat fatigues, which will give women, for the first time, tough, warm field clothes, just like the men's.

"We've been ricocheting like a bullet in a steel room on this. Every day somebody wants something new done on this overnight," complains Bernie Corona, an industrial designer whose unit of the Army Human Engineering Laboratory is charged with designing the combat uniforms and related systems for the Army.

Corona says his unit has been preoccupied with women's problems for a year. While some of them have been difficult, "you can overcome them all by design," he insists.

One of the more obvious ways women have been discriminated against in the military is in the area of combat uniforms. When the orders were made to put women into combat-related support units in 1977, the Army failed to realize that women's uniforms were not designed for long periods in the field.

The uniforms were made from a flimsy wash-and-wear fabric that does not hold warmth like a man's. Uniform Women's boots were designed for nurses in World War II. They did not have the heavy ribbed soles women would need in combat roles.

Men's uniforms and boots were ordered in smaller sizes, but that didn't work either. "Anatomically they're quite different than males," Corona notes.

Women look sloppy in uniforms tailored for males. The boots hurt their feet and the center of gravity of the Army's traditional "steel pot" helmet is too high for women, causing it to wobble on their heads.

At Fort McClellan in Alabama, the former Womens Army Corps headquarters which now trains "unisex" military police companies, women have been seen walking in sneakers and some hobbling on crutches because of injuries from marching in ill-fitting boots.

"We've had to force them to go to sick calls because they had blisters on their feet and they felt they couldn't afford to miss any training," explained Capt. Vicki Shepard, an M.P. company commander.

PUSHES MATERNITY UNIFORMS

Clifford L. Alexander, secretary of the Army, got involved in the boot problem, adding to Corona's worries. "I have been jogging the system," admits Alexander. "They (the Army) wanted to wait until they moved out the existing inventory. I said the hell with that. Let's get those boots out there."

Another thing Alexander has been pushing, despite Army protests, is the design of the maternity uniform. "We're slower than we ought to be on that," said Alexander, noting that the Air Force and the Marines have new maternity uniforms.

The old Army field pack harness was a problem for the Corona team. Corona calculated that if a woman jumped out of a truck with a full pack it would transmit about 200 pounds of pressure to the breast area.

"It shows up as bruises now, but God knows what will show up in 15 years," said Corona, explaining how the straps on the new Army pack are designed to curve away from the breast area.

One of the next projects is women's flameproof suits. "Some women will resew the whole damn thing overnight so it will fit them. If they do that to a flight suit or a tanker's uniform, that's a problem because the seams have to have a special Nomex thread to prevent the wearer from being burned."

Two tests have now been set up, designed to accommodate the fact that women have less upper body strength and that the great majority of them cannot run as fast or jump as high as men.

There are some problems with women, though, that can't be designed around. After elaborate testing, the Air Force has decided that women are not going to be used as security police at some bases, including SAC bases where the job is to guard aircraft and their nuclear weapons.

HIGH DROPOUT RATE

The reason was that the Air Force could not afford the enormous rate of female attrition in the program. In basic training 39 percent of the women dropped out, versus 15 percent of the men. In combat skills training, eight percent of the women dropped out, versus one percent of the men. Last March, when the Air Force abandoned the tests, only 42 of the 100 women who had survived all the tests were still on patrol.

Not much is known about the causes of higher attrition rates for women. Unless the problem is solved it is going to make the military more expensive. For example the Army, which just lowered female intelligence requirements to match that of male recruits, projects that the attrition rate among female high school dropouts will be 55 percent, the highest ever recorded. It costs between $5,000 and $10,000 to train a soldier.

PREGNANCY PROBLEMS

Another study, by the Army Military Personnel Center, states that pregnancy and the related problem of women who are sole parents is causing a still more serious problem, cutting down on the deployability of key military units.

At the time of the study, in July 1977, 11 percent of the women in the Army were pregnant and another 6 percent were sole parents, making 17 percent of the women unable to move with their units, versus three percent of the men—those who were sole parents. The pregnancy rate has since risen to 14 percent.

The Navy which has been redesigning 53 ships, giving them his and her toilets and sleeping quarters for some 5,000 enlisted women, it hopes to have at sea by 1984, has just begun to get a glimpse of the pregnancy problem.

Women in the Navy have an 11 percent rate of pregnancy. This fall the Navy repair ship Vulcan was among the first to be redesigned and was prepared to take the Navy's first contingent of enlisted women to join the Sixth Fleet in the Mediterranean.

LAST MINUTE SURPRISES

The Vulcan's skipper, though, found he had a problem. Ten of the 62 women assigned to the ship turned out to be pregnant. Two of them were discovered only a few hours before sailing.

The difference between a skipper at sea and the officer of an Army unit, a Navy personnel expert pointed out, is that while the Army commander has to get a replacement, "the skipper at sea is faced with a personnel loss."

Still, the expert added the Navy's plans to accelerate female recruiting and to find room for them in the fleet are now set in concrete. Where there were 6,000 Navy women at the onset of the all volunteer force in 1972, there will be 45,000 by 1985.●

CONGRESS NEEDS TO ENACT COAL SLURRY PIPELINE LEGISLATION

HON. WILLIAM F. CLINGER, JR.

OF PENNSYLVANIA

Friday, January 29, 1982

● Mr. CLINGER. Mr. Speaker, 1982 marks the 20th year that coal slurry pipeline legislation has been before the Congress. The time to act is now. Recent editorials in the New York Times and the Wall Street Journal have called attention to both the merits of coal slurry pipelines and the important role that they can and must play in meeting our future energy needs through the increased use of coal. I urge my colleagues to carefully read both of these thoughtful editorials.

The editorials follow:

[From the New York Times, Dec. 27, 1981]

UNCLOG THE COAL PIPELINE

The standard way to move coal from mine mouth to power plant is by rail and barge. But it's not the only way. Pulverized and mixed with water, coal "slurry" can be efficiently moved by pipe, for hundreds or even thousands of miles.

Why, then, is there only one coal slurry pipeline in operation? Because the railroads have blocked other pipe construction by refusing to provide rights-of-way across their tracks. Eminent domain legislation, now pending in Congress, would break the rail monopoly and help hold down the cost of generating electricity.

Coal is a key to America's self-sufficiency in energy. It is abundant, cheap to mine and, when burned with care, relatively benign to the environment. Railroads, supplemented by river barges, could probably meet any increase in the demand for coal transport. But without effective competition, the high cost of moving coal by train over long distances is bound to retard the coal revolution. That's where slurry fits in.

Three planned pipelines would move low-sulfur coal from the northern plains to southern cities now dependent on natural gas. One would feed Appalachian coal to power plants in Florida. And three others would serve the export trade, bringing fuel to the ports of Norfolk, Los Angeles and Portland.

The opposition in the plains states comes from farmers and ranchers, who fear competition for scarce but low-priced water. Their complaints have impressed the Reagan Administration, which opposes the pending Federal law on the pretext that interstate energy commerce should be left to the states. But the slurry companies are confident that entrenched water interests can be bought off. The more serious opposition comes from railroads.

Until last year the railroads had a good case. Unsympathetic regulators prevented them from making a profit on most freight; their virtual monopoly in the coal traffic was often the only thing that kept them from bankruptcy. But regulatory reform has now given the railroads the rate flexibility they need to survive. There is every reason to let pipelines begin to compete.

The bills submitted to the House and Senate would still require pipeline developers to make their peace with individual states on water and environmental issues. But they would pre-empt for the Federal Government the authority to require the railroads to sell their rights-of-way for slurry operations.

It is hardly likely that slurry pipelines could grab all the coal traffic. They are likely, however, to cut into railroad profits on coal. And that is how free enterprise is supposed to work.

[From the Wall Street Journal, Jan. 27, 1982]

DAMPENING THE COALS

Coal mining concerns and the railroads are locked in a classic feud pitting the principles of the competitive free market against the protection afforded by government regulation. The issue is whether pipelines should be allowed to compete with the railways for the expanding coal transport market. The Reagan administration, it's sad to say, is moving along the wrong track in this dispute.

The vast bulk of U.S. coal is moved by rail, at no little expense. For instance, railway charges to ship a load of coal from a Wyoming mine to a Texas utility are now about four times the price of the coal itself. Coal producers complain that they are "captive customers" to the railroads and would like to see competition.

One idea, which dates back more than 90 years, is to move coal by pipeline. Coal can be ground and mixed with a liquid—water, oil, methanol or even liquefied carbon dioxide from the coal itself—and the resulting slurry can be pumped through underground pipelines to utilities, industrial users and ships for export. Besides helping to develop our coal reserves, slurry pipelines could also provide direct and indirect savings in transportation costs, according to a 1980 study commissioned by the Energy Department. "To the extent that the threat of slurry pipeline competition acts to keep rail rates low, then savings can result even if coal is hauled by rail," it concludes.

The only coal pipeline now in operation runs from Arizona to Nevada and carries 4.8 million tons a year at a cost estimated at less than half the comparable rail shipment. There are tentative plans for another eight slurry lines, with a total capacity of over 150 million tons annually. However, work on these pipelines is being impeded by two major obstacles: inability to gain rights-of-way across the country's vast web of railway lines and the question of water availability in the West.

The federal government granted eminent domain authority to the railroads in the 1860s and 1870s to allow them to traverse land and thus to facilitate the growth of the West. The railways are blocking the entrance of slurry pipelines into the coal transport market by refusing them rights-of-way across railway property. Similar railway recalcitrance led to federal rights-of-way for petroleum pipelines during World War II and eminent domain authority has also been given to interstate gas pipelines and electric power lines.

The Reagan administration was asked to support legislation in Congress last year to permit coal slurries to cross railway lines. But Interior Secretary James Watt said the administration would not support granting eminent domain authority to the coal pipelines because it would violate states' rights. Mr. Watt's explanation was, in a word, fallacious.

All but one of the planned slurry pipelines would cut across state lines and therefore come under direct federal jurisdiction as interstate commerce. Besides, the only reason the coal producers are in this fix is the federal privileges granted to the railroads in the first place. The responsibility for granting rights-of-way to these slurry lines rests solely and squarely with the federal government, not in the state capitals.

A states' rights issue does arise, however, over the question of water availability. Here the legislation would limit the federal government's authority and would in effect give the governors veto power over coal lines based on water scarcity. This doesn't seem to bother the coal producers much. They figure they can probably find other liquids such as oil to convey the coal through the pipelines.

What really seems to be on the administration's mind is the worry that support of eminent domain for coal pipelines would be perceived in the West as federal infringement in the sensitive area of water rights, even though this is not truly the case. So the administration drew back from the issue by making this false plea for states' rights. In the meantime coal producers must cope with transportation bottlenecks, and the railways are asking the Interstate Commerce Commission to lift price regulations on coal exports. This too has the coal mine companies up in arms.

Congress will soon have a chance to redress the balance. The House Public Works Committee soon will take up the pipeline issue. (The House Interior Committee has already approved the eminent domain legislation.) We hope that Congress shows more concern than the administration for introducing competition in the coal transport market and thus, it's hoped, encourages further development of our vast coal reserves.●

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Sparrow, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to announce that pursuant to clause 4 of rule I, the Speaker signed the following enrolled joint resolution on Friday, January 29, 1982:

H.J. Res. 382. Joint resolution to permit the broadcasting in the United States of the International Communication Agency film "Let Poland Be Poland: A Day of Solidarity With the People of Poland."

THE PLIGHT OF GRADUATE STUDENTS

(Mr. PEYSER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PEYSER. Mr. Speaker, last Friday the administration confirmed its intention to remove graduate students from the guaranteed student loan program.

Mr. Speaker, this may be the only administration in the history of this country that is promoting the idea that the way to move this country ahead is to have less education.

I certainly hope that students and parents around this country are going to make their voices heard in this Congress and in the administration.

This cut, if it were to go into effect next September, would have the most devastating effect on the future of this country, on the very existence of graduate schools and, frankly, on everybody who is interested in moving ahead into a better world.

Mr. Speaker, I hope we win this fight and defeat this kind of action.

AGRICULTURAL MARKETING ORDERS

(Mr. SHAMANSKY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SHAMANSKY. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing legislation today to end Federal marketing orders for fruits and vegetables. I was glad that CBS Television's "60 Minutes" also recognized the problem and aired a segment critical of these marketing orders this past Sunday.

Last year news reports of tons of California navel oranges rotting in groves brought the absurdity of the existing system to public attention. Federal law empowers producers to form cartels, which divert portions of their crops from the fresh market in order to inflate prices.

In 1981, 40 percent of the navel orange crop was held off the fresh market. These oranges were processed for juice, fed to cattle, or left to rot. Anyone even selling oranges at cost to the poor could be fined.

In the past large quantities of prunes, apples, cherries, almonds, and other produce have been diverted to keep prices high. Yet the administration, after reviewing these regulations recently, left them largely untouched. Congress must now do what the administration was afraid to do and eliminate the waste, high prices, restricted entry, and lack of competition which is what these Federal food marketing orders really produce.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland). The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. MURTHA).

PUNXSUTAWNEY PHIL SAYS 6 MORE WEEKS OF WINTER

(Mr. MURTHA asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. MURTHA. Mr. Speaker, we received some bad news this morning—bad news for a country that has already been battered by one of the toughest of recent winters. For it is now official that we will have 6 more weeks of winter, because Punxsutawney Phil saw his shadow this morning.

Not only is this of interest to all of us because of winter weather, but it is significant nationally in noting it means more fuels stocks will be used in coming months, and that retail sales and other business developments could be hampered by bad weather.

For the information of the Members, I am pleased to insert into the RECORD the official proclamation of the Nation's leading weather forecaster.

Hear Ye! Hear Ye! To all faithful followers assembled here on Gobbler's Knob, and to all believers around the world—I, Charles M. Erhard, Jr., President of the Punxsutawney Groundhog Club, hereby proclaim that his Imperial Majesty, King Philip, emerged from his snow covered burrow at 7:26 a.m. this morning.

As he stood for a moment, looking tall and proud, Phil quickly studied the winds and other climate conditions. Then, in the dimness of the early dawn light, he spotted a heavy, black shadow zooming menacingly over his right side. The prediction, thus, is bad news for an America already reeling under the staggering blows of one of the worst winters on record. Punxsutawney Phil has seen his shadow . . . and that means there is even more trouble ahead in the savage winter of 1982. Having made his prediction, His Majesty has quickly retreated to the warmth and safety of his burrow, to await a much anticipated, but sure to be delayed, arrival of spring.

That is the official word today, February 2, 1982, from the Weather Capital of the world, Punxsutawney, Pennsylvania, the home of the only reliable weather forecasting Groundhog.

WITHHOLDING TAX ON INTEREST AND DIVIDEND INCOME IS COUNTERPRODUCTIVE

(Mr. HANCE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HANCE. Mr. Speaker, last week the President proposed the implementation of a new 5-percent withholding tax on interest and dividend income. I oppose this proposal and believe that it is counterproductive in light of recent changes in the Federal tax code to promote and encourage personal savings.

During the 96th Congress, the House of Representatives overwhelmingly rejected a similar proposal made by the Carter administration. This action occurred on August 19, 1980, when this body approved by a vote of 401 to 4 an amendment which I offered to reject the Carter withholding proposal.

The United States has one of the lowest personal savings rates of any industrialized country. Important savings incentives were enacted to address this situation just last summer in the major tax cut legislation approved by Congress. A withholding tax on interest and dividend income would work against these new incentives. Withholding would only increase the paperwork and regulatory burden on our Nation's financial institutions, business, industry, the Federal Government, and the private citizen. In addition, the individual saver would be robbed of the benefits of interest compounding to the extent that earnings are withheld.

CONCERNS THE PRESIDENT OVERLOOKED

(Mr. RATCHFORD asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. RATCHFORD. Mr. Speaker, the President's state of the Union address was, indeed, a moving experience for all of us. Thoughtful, challenging with its suggestion of a new federalism and, as always, effectively delivered. But given all this, the speech still left me with two gnawing concerns—this country's steadily rising unemployment, and the staggering 1982 deficit, which mounts daily. If Congress, and the administration, are to face up to these two economic woes, we must reexamine the gratuitous special interest tax breaks granted last summer—to big oil, to those who trade in big corporate tax losses, and to the size of the big estate tax breaks. All of these gratuitous tax breaks fuel the deficit, cause the high interest rates, and thus, contribute clearly to the mounting unemployment. As significant as a new federalism may prove to be, we may never get to it if we do not have the courage to face up to the old tax bill, and face up to it soon.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BIAGGI). The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. REUSS).

PRESIDENT REAGAN, MEET PRESIDENT HOOVER

(Mr. REUSS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. REUSS. Mr. Speaker, President Reagan has shared with us his answer to the mass unemployment and the severe recession which confronts the Nation in 1982. His answer is that prosperity is just around the corner, that no action should be taken against the recession, and that the proper course is the new federalism—reliance on voluntary charity, and on State-local responsibility. If each church would adopt 10 poor families, Mr. Reagan says, "We could eliminate all government welfare in this country." And welfare programs, such as aid to dependent children and food stamps, should be turned over to the States and localities.

Federalism, perhaps, but hardly new. Fifty years ago President Herbert Hoover, with the economy crumbling a year after he was sworn in, gave the Nation his version of the new federalism—reliance on voluntary charity, and on State-local responsibility. President Hoover said:

> This is not an issue as to whether people shall go hungry and cold in the United States. It is solely a question of the best method by which hunger and cold shall be prevented. It is a question as to whether the American people, on one hand, will maintain the spirit of charity and mutual self-help through voluntary giving and the responsibility of local government as distinguished, on the other hand, from appropriations out of the Federal Treasury for such purposes.

President Reagan, meet President Hoover.

A BALANCED AND FAIR BUDGET RESOLUTION OR NONE AT ALL

(Mr. PANETTA asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, since the President's state of the Union address, I have tried, as a member of the Budget Committee, to temper any reaction or criticism of the President's budget until additional details were revealed.

My hope was that the President and the administration would understand that there can be no budget resolution this year unless it is balanced and fair. This year's budget must not only stress the need for budget discipline in all areas but also address the immediate problems of unemployment and recession.

The state of the Union address, unfortunately, failed to reflect the need for balance and discipline in all areas—stressing additional cuts in domestic programs and not touching areas like defense or a reconsideration of the tax cut.

In today's Washington Post, there is additional confirmation that the administration is taking the same one-sided approach that it took last year—aiming the budget ax at the very same Americans already hard hit by last year's reductions—the elderly, the needy, children and students, and the unemployed. Again, the burden of budget cuts will fall entirely on those who are least able to afford it, particularly at a time of serious recession.

Enough is enough. If it is not clear to the administration yet, then let them understand that this Congress and the American people will not and cannot be so callous as to enact a budget resolution that is so incredibly unfair and unbalanced.

As one member of the Budget Committee, I will refuse—and I believe other Members of this Congress will refuse—to again consider multibillion-dollar cuts in health care for the elderly, in nutrition for children, in education benefits for students, in job training for the unemployed without even considering the possibility of reductions in defense increases and modifications in the $750 billion tax cuts.

Yesterday's increase in the prime rate is just one more sign of the inherent weakness of a program that is producing and justifying huge deficits for a narrow set of priorities that do not relate to the real needs of people in our society. It is my firm belief that there must be a balanced and fair approach to the budget resolution this year, or there may well be no budget resolution this year.

C-SPAN EXPANDS HOUSE FLOOR COVERAGE

(Mr. WRIGHT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, yesterday, C-SPAN, the network which covers daily floor proceedings, expanded its coverge to 16 hours a day, 7 days a week. This expansion means that proceedings in this Chamber will be available to evening audiences who now will be able to watch their Government at work.

Debate between House Members will continue to be seen in at least 10.5 million homes on a live, unedited basis. But with the expanded hours, C-SPAN will now be able to present the same gavel-to-gavel coverage on a tape-delay basis to those whose jobs prevent them from watching C-SPAN during the day. This new audience will also be able to watch C-SPAN's coverage of selected committee meetings and the hearings of the House and Senate.

Let us today congratulate the growth of C-SPAN and applaud the progress it and the cable television industry are making in fulfilling their public service obligation.

LEGISLATION INTRODUCED TO PROVIDE RELIEF FOR MUD SLIDE AND LANDSLIDE VICTIMS

(Mr. JOHN L. BURTON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. JOHN L. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, today I will introduce two pieces of legislation on behalf of myself and my colleague, LEON PANETTA of California, that would amend the Small Business Act with respect to disaster loan programs by reducing the interest rate to 3 percent and raising the amount of loan funds available to $300,000; also to make sure that mud slides and landslides are covered under Federal flood insurance programs.

Presently, there is a 16-percent interest rate and a $55,000 limit on the people in Marin County and throughout the Nation who have suffered disasters. This is wholly inadequate both from the amount of loan limitations and from the size of the interest payments. Disasters should be treated as disasters.

We should remember that these are repayable loans, and we should reach out not only with private charities, but also the charity of the Government for the people who have suffered these disasters.

BAIL REFORM ACT OF 1982 INTRODUCED

(Mr. ZEFERETTI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks).

Mr. ZEFERETTI. Mr. Speaker, today, I have introduced the Bail Reform Act of 1982. This bill introduces two important changes to our present system of pretrial release.

The first is to give Federal judicial officers the discretion to detain, prior to trial, those defendants who present a danger to the community or to particular individuals; those defendants who would obstruct justice or intimidate witnesses; or those defendants who are likely to flee prosecution.

I believe it is essential that judges have the latitude to identify dangerous criminal defendants and remove them from the streets prior to trial.

The second important feature of this bill is the elimination of money bail and surety bonds as conditions of release. The traditional system of money bail breaks down when dealing with narcotics cases. The Select Committee on Narcotics, which I chair, has heard of countless cases of major narcotics traffickers who can post unheard-of amounts of bail and then flee the jurisdiction or continue to traffic. Under the provisions of my bill, courts would have clear authority to detain such individuals prior to trial.

As chairman of the Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control, I urge my colleagues to give this proposal the most serious consideration. This proposal will give our courts the ability to protect the community from dangerous criminal defendants and bring fairness and equity to the existing bail system through the elimination of money bail.

RESOLUTION INTRODUCED CALLING ON PRESIDENT TO DECLARE MARCH 21, 1982, AS DAY OF COMMEMORATION FOR THE PEOPLE OF AFGHANISTAN

(Mr. LEVITAS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LEVITAS. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to be joining in a bipartisan effort with my colleagues who are members of the U.S. Congress-European Parliament Action Group on Afghanistan in introducing today a resolution calling on the President to declare March 21, 1982, as a day of commemoration for the people of Afghanistan.

Recently, we have properly focused our attention on the plight of Poland and the Soviet-backed repression of the workers movement and the Polish people. But we must not forget the struggle which has been going on for over 2 years now in the country of Afghanistan. The Afghan people are still suffering from the blatant aggression of the Soviet Union. We must not abandon our protest against the Soviet occupation of their country. The Afghans need our continued support.

For over 2 years, the Afghan people have been subjected to rule by a puppet regime of the Soviet Union. Soviet forces have occupied the nation of Afghanistan against the will of its people and have brought war and suffering to the country. And yet, the Afghan people have bravely defended themselves against the ravages of Soviet military force. Resistance to the military occupation and to the Soviet-backed government of Babrak Karmal continues to mount. The Afghan freedom fighters have gained in strength and ability. Against tremendous repression, these people have fought for and regained control of a large portion of the land taken by Soviet troops. The area of the countryside controlled by the puppet Babrak government continues to shrink.

This resistance and this fight for freedom deserves the recognition and support of the free world. On December 16, the European Parliament passed a resolution designating March 21, 1982, as a day of commemoration for Afghanistan. It is only fitting that we follow suit and join European nations and the rest of the world in this salute to the Afghan struggle for freedom and this condemnation of Soviet aggression.

President Reagan has endorsed our resolution and the State Department has agreed to coordinate private groups wishing to participate in and contribute to the day's events.

March 21 is the day the people of Afghanistan observe the start of the new year. In Afghanistan, the day symbolizes the nation's rebirth. We, in the West, who cherish the rights and privileges of freedom so dearly, should join the Afghan people in this celebration by recognizing their struggle and supporting their cause. Let this day serve as an outcry against Soviet tyranny and oppression and a cry for the rights and freedom of nations across the globe.

SPECIAL ORDER ON REAGAN BUDGET CUTS AS THEY IMPACT ON CHILDREN

(Mr. WEISS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, I have requested that, at the close of legislative business today, a special order be granted me to discuss the impact of the Reagan budget cuts upon the children of this Nation, those who are least able to protect themselves.

I invite my colleagues to participate in that special order, which will last for 60 minutes.

This morning's Washington Post give some indication as to where the President is going in relation to some of those programs which affect children in the fiscal year 1983 budget. It is suggested, for example, that medicaid is going to be cut by $2 billion, and food stamps $2.4 billion on top of the 1982 cut. AFDC (aid to families with dependent children) is being cut $1.2 billion, a reduction of 36 percent at a time when welfare rolls are increasing. Education is to be cut one-quarter of a billion dollars for elementary, secondary, and vocational education. That is a cut of 23 percent.

We will be developing these themes in the special order later this afternoon.

A PROTEST TO THE SOVIET GOVERNMENT

(Mr. GARCIA asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, 3½ years ago, several families of the Pentecostal faith sought refuge in the American Embassy in Moscow to escape religious persecution. During this time, the families have lived in a one-room apartment in the basement of the American Embassy. They are unable to emigrate. They are unable to leave the compound. They are prisoners in their own country because of their religious beliefs.

One month ago, two of the women living in the American Embassy went on a hunger strike calling attention to their plight. This past weekend, one of the women was hospitalized because American officials feared for her life. She was put in the custody of the Soviet Government. Soviet authorities will not guarantee her future; they have said they will only guarantee that she will be admitted to the hospital.

There are approximately 30,000 Pentecostalists who have tried to emigrate to the West. They are not troublemakers; they only want to be able to practice their faith freely. There is no reason they should not be allowed to do this. The Soviets have nothing to gain by persecuting these people. It is inhuman for them to do so; it is unnecessary. I deplore the Soviet position on this issue. They are needlessly making these people suffer.

My father was a Pentecostal minister, so I understand how important faith is for them. It is their reason for living; their religion is not casual, it is constant. I, too, believe in the importance of the spirit. To deny a person the right to practice their beliefs is wrong.

EMERGENCY YOUTH EMPLOYMENT TAX INCENTIVE ACT INTRODUCED

(Mr. GOODLING asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Speaker, I am confident the budget and tax action taken in 1981 coupled with the enterprise zone program being discussed will, in time, turn the economic picture around; however, I am also a realist and know this will not happen in time to adequately cope with the tremendous youth unemployment problem we will be faced with this summer.

Because of this concern I am joining with Congressmen HAWKINS and JEFFORDS in introducing the best "unrest insurance" program possible, entitled the Emergency Youth Employment Tax Incentive program—a program for the summer of 1982 only—May 17 through September 17 for young people between the ages of 16 and 21, 85 percent of whom are from economically depressed families.

An 85-percent tax credit to employers for each designated youth hired—and an exclusion from paying personal income tax; social security tax; and Federal unemployment tax.

Some will say we should tackle the youth differential wage problem first or at the same time. We do not have the luxury of time.

This legislation must move rapidly so enough time is available to get the private sector totally committed and involved.

I repeat—I believe the Emergency Youth Employment Tax Incentive Act to be the finest unrest insurance available at this time and ask that the Members of Congress join Congressmen HAWKINS, JEFFORDS, and me in this effort.

IN SUPPORT OF THE GOODLING BILL

(Mr. HAWKINS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HAWKINS. Mr. Speaker, within the next 4 months, hundreds of thousands of young Americans will begin their annual search for summer employment. In a period filled with economic uncertainty for the entire Nation, these young people will come face to face with the stark reality of unemployment.

Recently, I joined with Congressmen BILL GOODLING and JIM JEFFORDS in an effort designed to provide economic incentives to American businesses to insure that these young people will begin their entry into our economy with the hope of future employment rather than the despair which all too often characterizes American's workers today.

The Emergency Youth Employment Tax Incentive Act (H.R. 5389), which I cosponsored on January 28, would provide an 85 percent tax credit to employers who hire youth during the summer of 1982. Given the current economic conditions, exacerbated by the cutbacks in many Federal programs, the job market for this summer looks particularly bleak. Since our Nation currently is faced with an astonishing national unemployment rate of 8.9 percent and more than four times that figure for minority teenagers, we, in the Congress, must make every effort to provide the youth of this Nation with employment and training opportunities.

Mr. Speaker, in the final analysis, the economic stability of this Nation will be a function of our ability to insure that all able-bodied Americans choose to make a productive contribution to this society. Encouraging employers to hire young people will contribute substantially to this Nation's productivity. The incentives which we have provided in this bill will, in time, pay enormous dividends for our economy. I urge my colleagues to support H.R. 5389, the Emergency Youth Employment Tax Incentive Act.

RESOLUTION INTRODUCED TO PROCLAIM MARCH 21, 1982, AS AFGHANISTAN DAY

(Mr. PETRI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PETRI. Mr. Speaker, 2 years after the Soviets invaded Afghanistan, the resistance to their military occupation and the government they installed there continues to mount.

The ability of the Afghan freedom fighters to resist the Soviet occupation force and the Soviets' callous disregard for the Afghan people's right to self-determination has badly tarnished Moscow's reputation.

The growing evidence of Soviet use of chemical warfare during the 2 years of their brutal military repression also is arousing international condemnation.

In December, the European Parliament passed a resolution proclaiming European support for a March 21 observance of Afghanistan Day. Today, I join as a cosponsor in introducing a joint resolution establishing March 21 as Afghanistan Day.

We must make it clear to the Soviets that Afghanistan will not disappear as an issue of major international concern. Through this resolution, we demonstrate our solidarity with the Afghan people in their struggle against Soviet occupation.

PRESIDENT McKINLEY'S BIRTHDAY

(Mr. REGULA asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. REGULA. Mr. Speaker, I take the floor to commemorate the birthday of our 25th President, William McKinley.

During the 13 years he was a Congressman, President McKinley represented the area of Ohio's present 16th District, which I am honored to serve. During this time he served 2 years as chairman of the Ways and Means Committee.

With our current concern about the violation of human rights in Poland and other areas of the world, I think it is interesting to note President McKinley's comment on human rights in one of his speeches. He said:

> Popular government has demonstrated in its 124 years of trial here, its stability and security, and its efficiency as the best instrument of national development and the best safeguard to human rights.* * * The foundation of our Government is liberty; its superstructure peace.

President McKinley had a special fondness for the red carnation, and the ones you see in the dining room today honor his memory. In 1904 the Ohio Legislature adopted the red carnation as the State flower.

Present today is Beth Ann Antonosanti, reigning carnation queen of the Carnation City, Alliance, Ohio, who graciously helped distribute the carnations and who yesterday delivered a bouquet of Ohio's State flower to First Lady Nancy Reagan.

DOES JAPAN REALLY MEAN IT?

(Mr. SCHULZE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SCHULZE. Mr. Speaker, Japanese Government officials announced last week that they will eliminate 67 nontariff barriers to trade. The announcement was a little bit of good news and a lot of bad news.

The good news is that the Japanese acknowledge that they must open their markets to U.S. exports in order to balance the continuing trade deficit which reached $18 billion last year.

The bad news is that of the 99 most damaging nontariff barriers, they eliminated only 67.

The bad news is that the change was made administratively, rather than by statute and will be easy to reverse or ignore.

The bad news is that we have seen them do this kind of thing before: When their trading partners have been pushed so far that they are willing to fight back, the Japanese make whatever nominal concessions are necessary until the storm passes. Then it is back to business as usual.

Will these 67 barriers really come down? Will the Japanese find substitutes with the same blocking effect on imports?

Do they really mean it this time? I doubt it.

AFGHANISTAN DAY

(Mr. PRITCHARD asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. PRITCHARD. Mr. Speaker, it has been over 2 years since Soviet forces moved into Afghanistan in violation of all norms of international conduct and installed a puppet regime created in Moscow. In the months since December 1979 the people of Afghanistan have suffered terribly from an occupation by 80,000 foreign troops, and over 2½ million Afghans have fled their own country—15 percent of the nation's population. Those who remain in Afghanistan have bravely resisted the occupation, and the regime installed by the Soviets has managed to gain only tenuous control over the major cities. The freedom fighters of Afghanistan are an inspiration to free people everywhere. Yet there is a danger that time will erase Afghanistan from the world's conscience.

Last November it was my privilege to meet with concerned members of the European Parliament as they announced that they would sponsor a resolution declaring March 21, 1982, as Afghanistan Day, a day of remembrance for the suffering and the bravery of the Afghan people. It is fitting that we in the United States join with Europe in solidarity with Afghanistan to make Afghanistan Day a worldwide observance. Today Congressman DON RITTER and I have joined with over 70 colleagues to sponsor a resolution authorizing and requesting the President to declare this coming March 21 as Afghanistan Day. A similar resolution is being introduced in the Senate today.

We have been working closely with the administration on this resolution and a program of popular support for Afghanistan on March 21. As you know, the President endorsed this proposal in his state of the Union message last week. If we pass this resolution and join with people from all over the world in expressing our outrage at the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan and our support for the brave defenders of that beleaguered country, we will send a clear signal to both Moscow and Kabul. The Soviets will know that their actions in Afghanistan are not without a price. The Afghan freedom fighters will know the world stands with them.

PRIVATE ANTICRIME INITIATIVES

(Mr. McCLORY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. McCLORY. Mr. Speaker, the incidence of crime in this country is a serious problem that compromises the quality of life for most Americans. Not only is the crime rate itself disturbing, but the fear that it engenders in our citizenry is even more alarming. Recent studies, such as the "Figgie Report on the Fear of Crime," indicate that the public's apprehension about crime far exceeds its incidence.

As a supporter of Federal criminal justice assistance to the States and localities since its inception in the 1960's, I have consistently felt that one of the most important roles that the Federal Government can play in the fight against crime is providing the leadership necessary to bring all elements of the community together with the common purpose of deterring criminal activity. In my own neighborhood, we have been able to unite average citizens, church groups, law enforcement agencies, and other elements of the community in this effort. I firmly believe that this sort of grassroots effort is essential to effective crime reduction.

On a national scale, private anticrime initiatives have also been successful. In particular, a wide range of groups and government agencies have combined to form a crime prevention coalition, the purpose of which is to encourage the public and private sectors to cooperate in making neighborhoods safer. The coalition has made available to the public valuable information on arson, crime against the elderly, and various preventive measures that can be taken to protect homes, businesses, and neighborhoods from criminal attack. I commend the coalition and other cooperative groups for their diligent efforts to reduce crime, particularly violent crime.

Mr. Speaker, I urge all Americans to observe National Crime Prevention Week by meeting with their neighbors, community groups, local entrepreneurs, and law enforcement officials to plan appropriate community anticrime efforts. I hope that this body will commemorate the occasion by passing H.R. 4481, the Justice Assistance Act of 1981, which is designed to encourage community anticrime efforts and effective State and local law enforcement measures.

JAPAN'S DEFENSE RESPONSIBILITIES

(Mr. TRIBLE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. TRIBLE. Mr. Speaker, I invite my colleagues to cosign a letter to the Prime Minister of Japan, Mr. Suzuki, expressing the hope that Japan will increase its commitment to the defense of the Western Pacific region.

The Reagan administration has recommended that Japan assume primary responsibility for the defense of the airspace and sealanes up to 1,000 miles from the Japanese shoreline. It is important that the Japanese Government understand that this recommendation is supported by Members of the U.S. Congress.

Japan must commit a greater percentage of its gross national product to defense. We are encouraged by the projected 4.5-percent increase in real defense spending for the coming year. This increase, however, will bring Japan's defense expenditures to only ninety-three one-hundredths of 1 percent of GNP. The United States, in comparison, spends 5.2 percent of GNP on defense.

Our allies must assume a greater share of the burden of maintaining peace and freedom. America must do more and so must Japan and the nations of Western Europe.

A PLEA FOR COOPERATION

(Mr. LOTT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, last week was a beautiful week. On Thursday we honored Franklin Roosevelt by looking back and reminiscing about a difficult and different time in our Nation's history.

On Tuesday of last week, during the State of the Union message, we looked forward and heard possible solutions propounded for this time and for the difficulties of this day. President Reagan proposed new and challenging ideas to again make govenment responsible to the people and a workhorse for the betterment of all Americans rather than a burden.

Unfortunately, the leadership of the Democratic Party decided to oppose the President long before they even heard his proposals. Long before the President himself had decided what to propose to the Congress in his State of the Union message, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee had bought and produced an attack on the President and his future program to bring about economic recovery.

The result of this spirit of negativism coming from the liberal leadership is apparent and obvious to me from a perusal of their alternative to the President's program, and here it is.

I would suggest to the leadership on the other side of the aisle that rather than continually telling the American people how bad things are and failing to place credit where credit is due, on 25 years of liberal Democratic economic policy, they join with us in at least giving the President's program a hearing, which is always more productive than making proposals such as these.

We are not getting off to a very fast start this week when we look at our legislative schedule. I urge, Mr. Speaker, that we get this House moving and give the President's program a chance, with a decent hearing at least.

RESPONSES TO THE "NEW FEDERALISM"

(Mr. LUNGREN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LUNGREN. Mr. Speaker, there are a lot of different responses to the President's address this past week. One contained in the newspaper was that of the Speaker of the House, TIP O'NEILL, in which he described the President's "New Federalism" as "cold-hearted, mean, disgraceful." He said, "We have tried it before, and it didn't work."

He then goes on to say that once the States get the Federal money to use as they wish they will kill off many of these important programs, "and I can name you a dozen States that would wipe out the food stamp program immediately."

Well, if the Speaker has that information, I wish he would share it with the House because I think we ought to know which 12 States of the Union are that cruel that they would cut off these programs, and once he has identified those States perhaps he would invite the Members, Democrats as well as Republicans, to stand here and try to explain what they would do and why they would do it and in what States that would happen.

One thing I have found since I have been here in the last 3 years is that the best and the brightest are not always here in Washington, D.C., and that somehow some good ideas, some meaningful work, and some sincerity remains in those areas from which we come. This should not be a foreign capital. We do not have all the knowledge, we do not have all the good works, we do not have all the sincerity in the world to allow it to trickle down to our districts.

Rather, many of these things are in our districts, and it seems to me we ought to say that our constituents are as feeling as we are, are as reasonable as we are, and are as sincere as we are, and we ought to look at the New Federalism for what it is and make a sincere effort to see it work.

REVENUE ENHANCEMENTS—CONGRATULATIONS TO REPRESENTATIVE AND MRS. TOM DOWNEY

(Mr. CARNEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. CARNEY. Mr. Speaker, I would at this time just like to inform the people of our great Nation that for the last several weeks we have heard the term, "revenue enhancements," being used in lieu of another term, and I just wanted to make things perfectly clear to those people of our great Nation and say that there are two things certain in life: One is negative hospital discharge, and the other is revenue enhancements.

On a later note, I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate my colleague from Long Island, the gentleman from New York, Mr. TOM DOWNEY, and his wife Grace, who are the proud father and mother of a little boy today.

EL SALVADOR

(Mr. RUDD asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, opponents of our President are working hard to undermine and distort the objectives of the Reagan administration.

One media comment this morning referred to American aid to El Salvador as a "policy of extermination." Inflammatory phrases like this were used by the same apologists who pressured the last administration to hand over Nicaragua to our sworn enemies. This is not an internal criminal action, this is a war to determine whether our friends will survive. If we fail to assist them, we will surely have another Communist enemy at our back door.

REPEAL THE SYNTHETICS FUEL CORPORATION

(Mr. BROWN of Colorado asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, budget cuts, like charity, should begin at home.

My district in Colorado contains a majority of this Nation's commercially recoverable oil shale, and many energy companies have expressed an interest in applying to the Synfuels Corporation for Federal subsidies to develop that resource.

We cannot justify this kind of corporate welfare for major energy companies while our Nation faces huge budget deficits.

In his state of the Union address, President Reagan said he wanted to reduce the budget by eliminating "ineffective subsidies for business." That is why I am introducing legislation today to repeal the ineffective business subsidies provided by the U.S. Synthetic Fuels Corporation.

As many here know, the Synthetic Fuels Corporation was authorized by Congress in 1980 as part of the Energy Security Act. That act authorized an $88 billion program to develop various sorts of synthetic fuels. The $20 billion first phase of that program set a 500,000-barrel-per-day synthetic fuel production goal by 1987. To fund this program, Congress appropriated $5 billion to the Department of Energy for a "fast-start," interim program and $6 billion for the Synthetic Fuels Corporation, a quasi-governmental agency. Another $6.2 billion will be available to the Corporation in June.

While this $12.2 billion available to the Corporation is considered as "off-budget," it is a Federal obligation counted toward our soaring national debt.

Repealing the Synthetic Fuel Corporation will take pressure off the Nation's financial markets, pressure that continues to produce the high interest rates that are crippling our economy.

Repealing the Synthetic Fuels Corporation does not mean synthetic fuels will not be developed. I have met with the energy firms involved with oil shale development and toured their Colorado projects. These energy companies will move forward with the development of synthetic fuels that are economically justified without Federal subsidies. And they will do it without the burden of the Synthetic Fuels Corporation, which simply is another useless layer of Federal bureaucracy.

Mr. Speaker, we know the American people are willing to make economic sacrifices in order to end inflation and restore productivity. But we also know the public will only accept these sacrifices if they are shared equally by all. Abolishing the Synthetic Fuels Corporation will clearly demonstrate our commitment to the elimination of ineffective business subsidies.

I ask my colleagues to join me in this effort.

MATTERS OF CONGRESSIONAL PAY AND BENEFITS MUST BE DEALT WITH IN THE OPEN

(Mrs. HECKLER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.

Mrs. HECKLER. Mr. Speaker, there is no more crucial ingredient to the success of our Republic than the bond of trust that exists between the American people and their Government. Any time that bond is shaken, the cause of democracy suffers.

I am sad to say that at the close of last session this Congress took an action that did shake the people's confidence in Government—and I rise today to recommend that we do something about it.

In the last-minute rush to adjourn last December, the Senate added an amendment that increased tax benefits for Members of Congress to an otherwise very deserved and noncontroversial bill regarding benefits for suffers of black lung disease.

The circumstances surrounding the passage of that amendment—which was tied inextricably to the black lung benefits bill—did not reflect well on the high standards that our legislative process is supposed to represent.

Whatever the merits of the issue, the fact remains that congressional pay and benefits are subjects that must be dealt with out in the open—with recorded votes and free debate—if the public is to retain any trust in the integrity of our proceedings.

Last December the Congress did not heed those standards—and as a result, this institution has suffered in the eyes of the public. In passing legislation that significantly raised the limits on the automatic deduction that Members of Congress can claim on their Federal income tax returns—and by doing so in an atmosphere of haste and secrecy—we gave the impression of duplicity.

Mr. Speaker, it is imperative that we reverse the action taken last December—because no government can function without the trust of the people.

Today I am introducing legislation to repeal the congressional tax breaks enacted last month, and I call on my colleagues to support me in the push for speedy and favorable consideration of this bill.

I hope for the success of this legislative initiative, and, I will not claim the new tax deductions when I file my 1981 Federal income tax returns.

LEGISLATION DEALING WITH DRAFT REGISTRATIONS

(Mr. SOLOMON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Speaker, in a few minutes I will be introducing legislation which will be of extreme interest to over 800,000 young men who have failed to register for the military draft.

This legislation would simply make any young man who is eligible to register for the draft and who has failed to do so ineligible to receive any financial assistance or benefits, to participate in any program or activity receiving Federal financial assistance, and to be employed by the Federal Government or by any organization receiving Federal financial assistance.

Mr. Speaker, there are many young men that are being misled by college professors, by all kinds of people, that are not telling them that they are in violation or are subject to a felony conviction, to a fine of $10,000, or up to 5 years in jail. I think that is a terrible injustice to these young men.

I introduced this legislation today because President Reagan has given those that have failed to register a grace period for 30 days ending the last day of February. I would hope that every young man would pay attention to this legislation because after that grace period has passed I feel we have the support of the Members of Congress to enact this legislation.

EXTENDING PERIOD FOR AUTHORITIES PROVIDED UNDER DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE APPROPRIATION AUTHORIZATION ACT, FISCAL YEAR 1980

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from further consideration of the bill (H.R. 5379) to amend Public Law 97-76 to extend the period during which authorities provided under the Department of Justice Appropriation Authorization Act, fiscal year 1980, are continued in effect and ask for its immediate consideration in the House.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

H.R. 5379

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Act entitled "An Act to continue in effect any authority provided under the Department of Justice Appropriation Authorization Act, Fiscal Year 1980, for a certain period, and for other purposes", approved November 5, 1981 (Public Law 97-76; 95 Stat. 1068), is amended by striking out "February 1, 1982" and inserting in lieu thereof "October 1, 1982".

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. RODINO) is recognized for 1 hour.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. RODINO

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RODINO: Page 2, line 1, strike "October 1, 1982" and insert "June 1, 1982".

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, this bill is a very simple, but limited, solution to a difficult problem. As the House is aware, the Congress passed a similar continuing resolution authorizing appropriations and certain other authorities for the Department of Justice for a period of 4 months. That continuing resolution was necessary to allow the Department of Justice to continue its normal operations, during which time we hoped that the other body could resolve its difficulties in processing the Department of Justice authorization for fiscal year 1982. I would like to point out that we initially requested a continuing resolution for 6 months, to which the other body would not agree. They suggested that they would complete action on the authorization bill within the 4-month extension which would abrogate the necessity to extend the continuing resolution once again.

However, the continuing resolution expired on February 1, 1982, and the other body has not yet finished the main authorization bill. Due to this unfortunate set of circumstances, we are compelled to go to the floor and, once again, request an extension of the continuing resolution.

As I stated on September 29, 1981, it is imperative that the Department be given specific authorization to engage in certain law enforcement functions which include, among others, authority for the FBI to conduct undercover operations in all areas of their investigative responsibilities, authority to expend funds by the FBI to protect the President and the Attorney General, and authority to purchase firearms and ammunition for the FBI, INS, DEA, and U.S. marshals.

Mr. Speaker, these are but a few of the critical authorities that could lapse if the House does not take action on this bill.

The complete list of authorities is as follows:

Authority for the FBI to conduct undercover operations in all areas of their investigative responsibilities would expire.

Authority to expend funds by the FBI to protect the President and the Attorney General would expire.

Authority to hire motor vehicles for the Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) in its undercover operations would expire.

The Bureau of Prisons would lose its authority to expend funds for assisting State and local governments to improve their correctional systems.

The Attorney General's authority to expend funds for certain emergency situations would be curtailed.

The authority to pay rewards by the FBI, DEA, INS, and the Bureau of Prisons would expire.

The authority for the U.S. marshals to expend funds to provide for the supervision of U.S. prisoners in non-Federal institutions would be curtailed.

The authority to permit the U.S. marshals to bring to the United States from foreign countries persons charged with a crime would expire.

The specific authority to expend funds by the FBI to acquire, collect, and classify records and exchange them with authorized Federal, State, local, and other institutions would expire.

Authority for the Attorney General to expend funds regarding the conduct of certain investigations requested by the Department of State would be curtailed.

The reprograming restrictions this Congress placed on the movement of funds from one program to another to improve fiscal discipline within the Department would lapse.

The requirement that the Attorney General report to Congress any policy change in the enforcement of a law, which is the responsibility of the Department, because it is the Department's position that such a provision of law is not constitutional would lapse.

INS would not have authority to pay interpreters and translators needed to classify documents.

Authority for DEA to employ aliens by contract abroad would not be available.

DEA's authority to conduct reseach related to enforcement and drug control would expire.

I urge the adoption of this bill.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RODINO. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for yielding. It is my understanding that this body passed a Department of Justice authorization bill for fiscal year 1982 back in June. It has been held up in the other body because of various amendments, potential filibusters, et cetera.

I appreciate the fact that my colleague accommodated the suggestion of myself and others that the expiration date for this continuing authorization be changed from October 1 to June 1. He did it reluctantly, I know, because he had made an agreement with the gentleman from the other body, who is the chairman of the counterpart committee in that body. Nevertheless, I appreciate the gentleman's doing so because I think it is absolutely wrong that this body, which acted in plenty of time to continue this authorization, has been put in the position of sitting around waiting for the other body to act on this important legislation.

So I want to make it clear that the chairman has been nice enough to accommodate us because many of us believe that an October 1 date would take the pressure off the other body to get on with this matter and act. I just wanted to acknowledge that the chairman was very accommodating. If he finds it difficult in dealing with the chairman of the other body's committee, I would just refer him to us.

Mr. RODINO. I do appreciate the comments of the gentleman from California, and especially explaining the reason for my amendment. I do recognize, too, that there is some merit in what the gentleman suggests. I would hope, as the gentleman has volunteered, that maybe I might be persuasive with the other body in recognizing the need that we not meet with these impediments and obstacles when we are considering a matter of this importance that does involve the funding of certain programs that all of us recognize are important to the continuing operation of the Justice Department, the Federal Bureau of Investigation and its other agencies.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. I appreciate the chairman's comment and I hope that he will carry the word to the other body. We expect them now to act. Four months seems more than adequate time to get on with the business at hand, especially since we have sent our authorizing bill over last June.

I thank the gentleman. Please assure the chairman of the committee in the other body that we just felt that 4 months was enough time.

Mr. RODINO. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. McCLORY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RODINO. I yield to the distinguished ranking minority member of the House Judiciary Committee, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. McCLORY), who has always recognized the importance of this matter and has been a cosponsor with me in this resolution.

Mr. McCLORY. I thank the gentleman for yielding. I want to join my colleagues in support of this continuing resolution.

I, too, agree that it is most unfortunate that we have to pursue this route, especially since last June, by an overwhelming vote, the authorization legislation which covers these same important activities was overwhelmingly passed by this body. It is certainly my hope that this will be the last extension that we will require. Perhaps by reducing the time from October 1 to June 1 the other body will be more inclined to get on with the business of passing the authorization bill for fiscal year 1982 so that these important functions, which are so vital to our internal security, can be settled.

I want to commend the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. RODINO) for making the unanimous-consent request which brought H.R. 5379, which I have cosponsored, before us for immediate attention and prompt action. As the distinguished chairman of the Judiciary Committee has explained, as amended, it would continue in effect until June 1, 1982, authorization for many important functions performed by the Department of Justice. These include, among other things, the undercover activities of the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

Mr. Speaker, I share my colleagues' concerns over the recurring necessity to proceed in this manner. As my colleagues may recall, this body approved a Justice Department authorization bill for fiscal year 1982 by an overwhelming majority last June. In the fall, this body concurred in a 4-month continuing authorization for the Justice Department urged by the other body to afford it additional time to settle some controversial issues and to facilitate any necessary conference committee activity. Our fears at that time that a 4-month extension, which included a relatively lengthy district work period, might prove insufficient were unfortunately confirmed.

As my colleagues are no doubt aware, the other body is scheduled to recommence its deliberations on the fiscal year 1982 authorization bill this week. We are therefore hopeful that a bill can be sent to the President's desk before the expiration of the period for continuing authority provided in H.R. 5379, as amended. However, because of the serious detrimental effects on the important crime-fighting functions of the Justice Department that we have witnessed following past expirations of authority, and, hopefully, in order to avoid another repeat of this occasion, we believe that this authority should be continued until June 1.

Mr. Speaker, I again commend the gentleman from New Jersey for his efforts in extending the authorization for Justice Department activities.

Mr. RODINO. I thank the gentleman for his cooperation and yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. RODINO.)

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

TEXT OF PROPOSED AGREEMENT FOR COOPERATION BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA AND THE PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF BANGLADESH CONCERNING PEACEFUL USES OF NUCLEAR ENERGY—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 97-136)

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and, together with the accompanying papers, without objection, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

I am pleased to transmit to the Congress, in accordance with Section 123 d of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended (42 U.S.C. 2153(d)), the text of the proposed Agreement for Cooperation Between the United States of America and the People's Republic of Bangladesh Concerning Peaceful Uses of Nuclear Energy and accompanying annex and agreed minute; my written determination, approval, and authorization concerning the agreement; and the memorandum of the Director of the United States Arms Control and Disarmament Agency with the Nuclear Proliferation Assessment Statement concerning the agreement. The joint memorandum submitted to me by the Secretaries of State and Energy, which includes a summary analysis of the provisions of the agreement, and the views and recommendations of the Members of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission and the Director of the United States Arms Control and Disarmament Agency are also enclosed.

The Nuclear Non-Proliferation Act of March 10, 1978 sets forth certain requirements for new agreements for peaceful nuclear cooperation with other countries. In my judgment, the proposed agreement for cooperation between the United States and Bangladesh, together with its accompanying annex and agreed minute, meets all statutory requirements.

The proposed bilateral agreement reflects the desire of the Government of the United States and the Government of Bangladesh to establish a framework for peaceful nuclear cooperation between our two countries in a manner which recognizes both the shared non-proliferation objectives and the friendly and harmonious relations between the United States and Bangladesh. The proposed agreement will, in my view, further the non-proliferation and other foreign policy interests of the United States.

I have considered the views and recommendations of the interested agencies in reviewing the proposed agreement and have determined that its performance will promote, and will not constitute an unreasonable risk to, the common defense and security. Accordingly, I have approved the agreement and authorized its execution, and urge that the Congress give it favorable consideration.

ANNUAL REPORT ON FEDERAL ENERGY CONSERVATION PROGRAMS—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and, together with the accompanying papers, without objection, referred to the Committee on Energy and Commerce:

To the Congress of the United States:

In accordance with the requirements of Section 381(c) of the Energy Policy and Conservation Act (42 U.S.C. 6361(c)), I hereby transmit the 1980 Annual Report on Federal Energy Conservation Programs. The period covered by the report precedes my term of office.

RONALD REAGAN.
THE WHITE HOUSE, February 2, 1982.

GEN. JAMES L. DOZIER

(Mr. BIAGGI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, today, together with 57 of my colleagues I am proud to introduce a House joint resolution commending the Italian Government and police for their masterful work which led to the release of Brig. Gen. James L. Dozier on January 28. I have sponsored this as a joint resolution with the hope that once passed by Congress—the President will sign it.

I know that every American in this country and abroad shared the same sense of happiness, relief, and patriotism that I did last Thursday when the weary and unshaven face of General Dozier was shown on television screens as—at last—a free man. After being held at gunpoint for the last 42 days by members of the Red Brigade, a well-known Italian terrorist group, our highest ranking NATO official in Italy is safe, well, and ready to get back to work.

While this incident has proven to be a great source of joy for General Dozier's family, friends and for the millions of Americans who prayed every day for his safe release, let us not forget how long and what it took to transform this from a ordeal to a triumph. For 42 torturous days—including the entire Christmas holiday season—the Dozier family lived in fear about the general's fate. Their apprehensions were heightened by his Red Brigade captors who indulged in the ghoulish ritual of sending photos and cryptic messages about Dozier's condition.

Throughout these 7 weeks, the Italian police authorities painstakingly and relentlessly pursued every lead which might bring them closer to the captors. In addition—the longstanding friendship between the United States and Italian Governments was never in better working order.

Suddenly on January 28—with lightning speed—the general was rescued—and the nightmare was over. As a former New York City police officer, I feel that I am qualified to recognize expert police work when I hear about it. The January 28 daring rescue of the general will go down in history as one of the most daring and brilliantly executed examples of police work ever seen. The specially trained unit of Italian police officers who broke into the Padua apartment to surprise Dozier's captors and found him with a gun pointed at his head, had for a long while, been on the trail of the two ringleaders of the kidnaping. Antonio Savasta and Emilia Libera, known in Italian police circles as "the Bonnie and Clyde" of the terrorist world, have been eluding police for the last 5 or more years. They have been linked to some of the most gruesome terrorist activities in Italy including the 1978 kidnaping of Prime Minister Aldo Moro and also to many vicious attacks on Italian police. They first made their criminal debut when they fought a gun battle with police outside the railroad station in Cagliari, Sardinia, and then mysteriously disappeared into the night.

Thursday, these police officers successfully put to an end their search for our General Dozier when they secured his freedom. I would like to commend the special team of officers for their courage, patience, and professionalism in carrying out their duty. Throughout Italy, their feat has touched off celebrations and proven to be a great source of national pride—much like that experienced by Americans upon the release of the 52 hostages and the pride of the Israeli's when their soldiers rescued hijack victims in Entebbe. The headlines on newspapers throughout Italy expressing congratulations from President Reagan and Pope Paul II have been a boost in morale for Italians who have for a long time had to learn to live with the fear of terrorism and the frustration caused by the inability of law enforcement officials to control this problem.

I have been in touch with Ambassador Rinaldo Petrignani of Italy as well as our own Ambassador Rabb regarding my fervent desire that these fine police officers receive the kind of tribute they are due. Although their undercover assignments may make it impossible for any formal presentation to be held, I hope that this resolution will be a significant symbol of gratitude from the people of America. The Dozier rescue symbolizes more than just good solid police work. It could be recorded as the catalyst of the worldwide movement to break the backs of terrorist organizations. The effectiveness of the Red Brigade was established because of their ability to evade police authorities. Consequently, they began to act with—impunity—not fearing apprehension.

It is my fervent hope that the January 28 rescue has thrown fear into the hearts of the worldwide terrorist movement. Governments must continue to operate with cooperation not confrontation. They must see terrorism as an enemy not only to external security—but their own internal security as well. If perceived in this manner, actions will be taken to control the problem.

The Italian police and Government deserve the accolades which are directed to them by a grateful world. I urge my colleagues to give this legislation their prompt approval so we can convey in a tangible way our gratitude to Italy. Of course, I seek passage of this resolution to honor a great American patriot Gen. James Dozier. On Saturday, the New York Times ran a profile of Dozier which I would like to have placed in the RECORD at this time:

A BATTLE-HARDENED GENERAL

(By Richard Halloran)

Brig. Gen. James L. Dozier, who won a Silver Star and a Bronze Star with two Oak Leaf Clusters for heroism in combat during the war in Vietnam, may never have been closer to death than he was yesterday when Italian policemen rescued him as he was being held at gunpoint by Red Brigade terrorists in an apartment in Padua.

With his dramatic release, the 50-year-old general, the first foreigner to have been taken hostage by the terrorist organization, became only the second captive of the Red Brigades to have been rescued by the Italian authorities. The first was Vallarino Gancia, an Italian industrialist, in 1975.

At the time of his kidnapping in December, General Dozier was serving in a NATO administrative post as deputy chief of staff of logistics and administration for allied land forces in southern Europe.

It was not an unusual progression for an officer who has been described as a soldier's soldier from his earlier years as a troop commander, tactician and much decorated veteran of the Vietnam War.

ONE OF THE BEST OFFICERS

Col. James Leach, his immediate superior when they served together in the 11th Armored Cavalry Regiment in Vietnam in 1968-69, characterized the general recently as "one of the best army officers we ever had." General Dozier, then a major, was the regiment's operations officer.

Under the supervision of Colonel Leach, now retired, Major Dozier planned a 30-day offensive during which the regiment covered 1,000 miles in the southern part of South Vietnam searching for North Vietnamese and Vietcong strongholds in the area of the Iron Triangle, Kuan Loc, Tay Ninh and Loc Ninh. The drive was in part an experiment in using tanks in the jungle.

Col. Glenn Finkbiner, who also served with Major Dozier in Vietnam, recalled that whenever there was a firefight, "Dozier had no hesitation in going into the hottest part of the battle."

Such qualities of leadership won him the Legion of Merit in addition to his four awards for heroism. He also was awarded a Purple Heart for a shrapnel wound in an arm.

TWO DEGREES IN ENGINEERING

James Lee Dozier was born April 10, 1931, in Arcadia, Fla., where he has maintained a permanent home throughout the travels necessitated by his military career.

He received a Bachelor of Science degree in engineering along with his commission as a second lieutenant on graduation from West Point in 1956, and later earned a Master of Science degree in aerospace engineering from the University of Arizona.

General Dozier is married to the former Judith Stimpson. They have a daughter, Cheryl, who is a second lieutenant in the Air Force at the Rhein-Main Air Force Base near Frankfurt, West Germany, and a son, Scott a college student who has served in the Coast Guard.

Before his service in Vietnam, General Dozier went to the Armored School at Fort Knox, Ky., for basic and advanced training in armored warfare.

On his return from Vietnam, General Dozier, then a lieutenant colonel, was assigned to the Pentagon, where he served from 1969 to 1971 as a staff officer on the Southeast Asia team at the Army operations center.

ANOTHER TOUR AT PENTAGON

Between 1971 and 1974, General Dozier saw service in Europe for the first time as a brigade executive officer and commander of an armored cavalry squadron and then attended the Army Command and General Staff College at Fort Leavenworth, Kans., and the Army War College at Carlisle Barracks, Pa.

Another tour of duty at the Pentagon as a staff officer for research and development and as a military assistant to a senior civilian official was followed, in 1976, by assignment to Fort Hood, Tex. There he rose, over the next four years, from commander of the Second Brigade, Second Armored Division, to chief of staff of the division and then to chief of staff of the III Corps, of which the division was a part.

From Fort Hood, General Dozier went to the Defense Language Institute in Monterey, Calif., to study Italian before going to Verona, Italy, in 1980 and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization assignment that was to target him for the Red Brigade terrorists.

Mr. Reagan interrupted a luncheon honoring President Franklin Delano Roosevelt this afternoon to say: "The same courage and resolve that James Dozier demonstrated on the battlefield in wartime have seen him through this new test with flying colors. His country and our allies can be very proud of this gallant man."

Mr. Reagan also said, to repeated applause, that he had talked with President Sandro Pertini of Italy and "expressed America's appreciation for the dedicated and effective work of the Italian authorities in tracking down General Dozier's kidnappers and saving his life." The President continued, "They, too, have acquitted themselves with honor."

Mr. Reagan did not mention the six American military personnel who assisted the Italian police.

The President's national security adviser, William P. Clark, echoed the President's words, as did other Government officials and members of Congress. But like the others, Mr. Clark said nothing about the role played by the American military team that had helped in the effort to find and rescue General Dozier.

THINKERS NOT FIGHTERS

The six men, whose names, ranks, and units have not been disclosed, were sent to Italy shortly after General Dozier was abducted on Dec. 17. They are specialists in intelligence counterterrorist operations, communications, and operational security in units from which a secret counterterrorist task force may draw people when needed.

The American team, however, did not take part in the Italian police raid that rescued General Dozier, their role having been limited to advice and assistance. "They were thinkers, not fighters," said an informed officer here. "They were not door kickers."

On the American role in the rescue, military officers here were quick to praise the Italians and to assert that the United States and particularly the six-man team in Italy had played a subordinate role. Said one officer, "Ninety-nine percent of this was done by the Italians."

The President also told his luncheon audience: "I've spoken with the general by telephone and I'm happy to relay his report that he's in fine shape. And I can tell you that just hearing him—I told Nancy he sounded as if he'd just gone down to the corner for five minutes." His audience laughed.

On Capitol Hill, Senator Charles H. Percy, the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, told reporters: "I commend the authorities in Italy who have made this possible, the dispatch with which they have done it, and the brilliant way it was carried out. We congratulate them and we are pleased."

In the Pentagon, there was quiet jubilation. Secretary of Defense Caspar W. Weinberger talked by telephone with General Dozier to welcome him back to freedom. In the corner of one office was a hand-lettered sign that said, "Viva L'Italia."

GEN. JAMES L. DOZIER

(Mr. ANNUNZIO asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous material.)

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, all of us were relieved and delighted that Brig. Gen. James L. Dozier was rescued without bodily injury, and today I am introducing a concurrent resolution, sponsored by 166 Members, to congratulate the Italian Government and its antiterrorist police forces for their skill and courage in resolving this brutal kidnaping, and to extend to General Dozier the best wishes of the Congress for a quick recovery from his recent ordeal.

About 10 days ago I was in Rome, along with my distinguished colleague, Chairman PETER RODINO, and other Members of the Congress, and we talked to President Pertini of Italy. I want to say to the Members that his entire conversation was on the subject of the terrorists and his deep, deep desire, to insure that General Dozier would be returned home safely to his family. About 3 days after the conversation with the President of Italy, I am delighted that the Italian police were able to follow the lead of the President of Italy and to have General Dozier returned.

I invite and urge all my colleagues in the House to cosponsor this resolution of national gratitude.

An editorial from the January 29 edition of the Washington Post, entitled, "An Italian Triumph," will follow this short statement, as well as the text of my resolution and the cosponsors to date:

AN ITALIAN TRIUMPH

The rescue of Gen. James Dozier was a triumph of skillful and vigorous work by the Italian police. But it was part of a larger pattern. Italian justice is winning its long and desperate struggle against the terrorists.

Amidst the relief that Americans will feel, and gratitude to the Italian authorities, its important not to miss the larger significance of the happy ending to this story. Terrorism is not confined to Italy, and the terrorists always seem, at first, to hold all the advantages. The Italian police have shown what society can do to protect itself. It is an extraordinary feat to retrieve a captive alive, and this spectacular success will be reassuring to that vast majority of people, not only in Italy, who detest terrorism, its methods and its purposes. For Italians, the Dozier case is only the most dramatic example of the remarkable capability that their police have developed in this long guerrilla war.

More than 2,000 terrorists have been arrested in Italy within the past two years. That took a lot of quiet courage on the part of the people responsible for it—not only the policemen and prosecutors, but judges, prison officials, jurors and witnesses, who encountered personal risks almost unknown in law enforcement in this country as the Red Brigades and their allies retaliated with campaigns of intimidation and assassination. But it has been clear for some time that they were losing.

The psychological atmosphere within the Red Brigades has changed drastically in the last several years. Internal morale seems to have broken down. When the gunmen were riding high, those occasionally arrested held grimly to the rule of silence. Currently, it is obvious that the suspects are telling the police quite a lot about their connections.

The Red Brigades collaborate with other organizations of the violent ultra-left from Northern Ireland to the Middle East, and there's good reason to think that some of their money comes from the Soviets, who are always happy to stir the pot. But it wasn't the Soviet money, or any other foreign support, that made terrorism a mortal threat to Italy. It was Italians' own ambivalence about national authority. That ambivalence, for the vast majority, has now evidently been resolved. The Red Brigades intended the kidnapping to be an attack on NATO. The outcome was, instead, a dramatic demonstration of Italians' determination to enforce the law, and to keep the gunmen from taking over their politics.

H. CON. RES.?

Concurrent resolution expressing the sense of the Congress regarding the successful rescue of Brigadier General James L. Dozier

Whereas the kidnaping of Brigadier General James L. Dozier by the Red Brigades represented another tragic example of the sickness of international terrorism;

Whereas the Italian antiterrorist police forces exercised patience and efficiency in their investigation of the kidnaping;

Whereas the Italian Government demonstrated sensitivity and resolve in its oversight of police activities and its dealings with the Dozier family;

Whereas the difficulties of rescuing General Dozier without bodily harm required the highest degree of skill and courage; Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Congress congratulates the Italian Government and its antiterrorist police forces for the successful rescue of Brigadier General James L. Dozier; and be it further Resolved, That the Congress extends to General Dozier and his family best wishes for a quick recovery and return to normal life.

A CANDLE FOR POLAND, BUT DARKNESS IN LATIN AMERICA

(Mr. SEIBERLING asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and to include extraneous material.)

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, when President Reagan expressed his grief and outrage at the imposition of martial law in Poland by placing a lighted candle in a White House window, his gesture spoke for all Americans. The small flame burning in the White House window symbolized the light of liberty which had been so brutally snuffed out in Poland.

I share the heartbreak of all Americans over events in Poland. In Poland, a military-dominated government, supported by the Soviet Union, is making war on its own people. We rightly condemn its actions. However, our condemnations would carry greater weight were it not for the fact that in El Salvador and in Guatemala, military-dominated governments, supported by the United States, are also making war on their own people.

The President's concern about Communist repression in Poland is in curious contrast to his seeming blindness to rightwing repression in Latin America—our own backyard. In Guatemala, for example, thousands of people have died at the hands of paramilitary death squads, which operate with impunity in that country. In Argentina, tens of thousands of Argentine citizens have simply disappeared, never to be heard from again. In El Salvador, thousands of peasants and students, priests, and nuns have been indiscriminately gunned down by right-wing hit squads and elements within the Salvadoran security forces.

What is the administration's response to the repression of freedom in Latin America? As Anthony Lewis points out in his December 28, 1981 column in the New York Times, "the Reagan administration has cuddled up to the oppressors." The President ended an arms embargo against Guatemala, and has since permitted the sale of jeeps and trucks to that government. Sales of helicopter parts are also planned. With administration support, Congress terminated prohibitions on military sales and assistance to Argentina. El Salvador has become the centerpiece of the administration's efforts to get tough with Communist/Cuban "interference" in Central America. The government of Jose Duarte has received tens of millions of dollars in military assistance, and the United States has military advisers currently providing counterinsurgency training to El Salvador's Armed Forces—the same forces which have been repeatedly implicated in the torture, disappearences, and murders of Salvadoran peasants, priests, and, recently, American missionaries.

The stark contrast between the administration's outrage over the imposition of martial law in Poland and administration policy toward Latin America undermines our Government's credibility at home and abroad. As Mr. Lewis' column points out, perfect "consistency about human rights is not possible in an imperfect world. Whatever the flaws in the American record, we are right to speak up about Poland. But our words would carry more weight if we applied them with equal determination in our own hemisphere."

A news article in the December 27, 1981 edition of the Akron Beacon Journal also highlights the fundamental flaw in American policy toward Latin America. Rev. Albert Reymann, a Maryknoll priest who is visiting Akron after 30 years in El Salvador and Guatemala, sees strong parallels between U.S. policy toward El Salvador, and our involvement in Vietnam. According to the Beacon Journal article, Reverend Reymann "sees the struggle in Central America not as a United States-Soviet showdown, but as a challenge to U.S. hemispheric domination. The priest said Latin American nations are evolving economically and politically and their resentment of U.S.-backed military governments is growing. The changes may result in socialist countries in Central America because the people associate U.S. democracy with their subjugation."

By emphasizing military solutions, we not only weaken our credibility but we deprive ourselves of the means to help solve the underlying economic and political problems. Yet if they are not solved, there is little or no chance for democracy. As Reverend Reymann points out, "if you want communism in Central America and all of Latin America, keep up what you're doing now, and you'll get it."

The Cleveland Plain Dealer for last Friday, January 29, carried an article, reprinted from the Boston Globe, by Cynthia Arnson, a former Clevelander and a scholar at the Institute for Policy Studies in Washington. Ms. Arnson has visited El Salvador several times. She notes that, while the Reagan administration has endorsed a political solution in El Salvador centering around elections to be held in March, the Salvadoran Army has issued a "hit list" of 138 "subversives" and "traitors" which includes most of the opposition figures the State Department would like to see returned to El Salvador to campaign freely.

In view of the ruthless brutality with which the military in El Salvador have slaughtered citizens who have no apparent connection with revolutionary activity, it is difficult to see how any person would dare run for office against the "official" slate in the Salvadoran elections. The most recent incident, reported in the February 1 Washington Post, involves the execution of an undetermined number of old persons, women, children, and ordinary citizens, whose only ostensible offense was that they lived in a slum identified as the base of 19 alleged guerrillas who were themselves executed at night without any evident proof of their guerrilla activity. Last week, an entire village was reported destroyed by Salvadoran troops.

Last summer, during a meeting with Salvadoran President Jose Duarte, I asked him about the alleged execution by the army of the entire Las Lajas plantation soccer team in the town of Armenia on July 30, 1981. The soccer team had reportedly been killed because they had beaten the Salvadoran Army team. President Duarte denied the accuracy of the report, and told me he would send me documentation to prove it was false. I have heard nothing from him since.

Deepening U.S. involvement in the Salvadoran conflict is becoming increasingly likely. One of the principal lessons of Vietnam was that if a government repeatedly and without provocation attacks its own people, it will eventually alienate its base of support among the population. The failure of the Government of El Salvador to control its own armed forces is eroding popular support for the Government. It may already be too late, but unless the United States immediately institutes draconian steps to curb the Salvadoran military, we will be wasting further military aid on a lost cause.

The recent certification by President Reagan that the Duarte regime is making progress in controlling violations of basic human rights by the military seems clearly unfounded, if recent news reports are true. Coming on the very heels of the latest reports of such atrocities by El Salvador's armed forces, the administration's announcement that it is shipping millions of dollars worth of additional weapons to these same armed forces exhibits, to say the least, an incredible insensitivity to the feelings of the American people, as well as the world.

One may be entitled to conclude that those currently administering our foreign policy in Central America have learned nothing from our disastrous experience in Vietnam. That experience should have taught us that no amount of military power that would be tolerated by the American people can prevail in a Third World country against a determined revolutionary movement, if the government is unwilling to protect its own people against indiscriminate slaughter by its own armed forces.

It is doubtful that we can effectively prevent these new shipments of weapons to the armed forces of El Salvador. However, we can and must require, by appropriate legislation, that there will be no more such shipments until and unless the atrocities by the armed forces have ceased, and those responsible for them have been removed from authority and punished.

CANDLE IN THE WINDOW

(By Anthony Lewis)

BOSTON, December 27.—When President Reagan expressed his outrage at what is happening in Poland, he spoke for all of us. To see "the stirrings of liberty" crushed by "brute force," as he put it, had touched the deepest American feelings. We wish we could do more than light a candle in the window.

But the President's outrage was curiously selective. And it does not slight the Polish tragedy to recognize that.

Mr. Reagan denounced the Polish authorities for "killings, mass arrests and the setting up of concentration camps." Another government in the world has killed not seven, the official figure of deaths under martial law in Poland, or the 200 mentioned in some reports, but thousands of its own citizens. That government is in America's backyard, and the Reagan Administration has not said a critical word about it.

Guatemala is the place. In a report this year Amnesty International said that "a Government campaign of political murder" personally directed by President Romeo Lucas Garcia had killed nearly 5,000 Guatemalans in the last three years. The Inter-American Human Rights Commission found the Government responsible for the "great majority" of thousands of illegal executions.

The Guatemalan Government is there as the result of a C.I.A.-organized coup years ago. It uses American, not Soviet weapons. Its state terrorism, perhaps the bloodiest on earth today, might be expected to arouse moral indignation or at least concern in Washington.

What has the Reagan Administration done about Guatemala? It sent a special ambassador there, General Vernon Walters, who said the U.S. wants to help that Government defend "peace and liberty." It ended an arms embargo by supplying $3.2 million worth of jeeps and trucks. It sent a background paper to American diplomats around the world saying that Guatemala was threatened by "extremist groups."

Or consider Argentina. During the last five years at least 15,000 of its people—some estimates run to double that—have "disappeared." They were kidnapped by the military, tortured, dropped from planes. Jews have been the victims of particular brutality; swastikas are in display in the jails and torture chambers.

What has the Reagan Administration done about Argentina? Last March it gave a warm welcome in Washington to the President-elect, General Roberto Viola. It worked with Argentian to try to soften critical inquiry into the disappearances by a United Nations Commission. Reagan people have thrown mud at one of the prominent victims of Argentine fascism, Jacobo Timerman. Secretary of State Haig said the United States shared values with Argentina, notably "a belief in God."

Or consider Chile. Its military took over in a coup against a left-wing constitutional Government that the United States, working through the C.I.A., had tried to keep out of power. The military Government of President Augusto Pinochet sent agents to Washington to murder the former Foreign Minister, Orlando Letelier—and then refused American demands for extradition of those responsible.

What has the Reagan Administration done about Chile? Last February it lifted a ban on U.S. financing of trade with Chile, imposed by President Carter when the Pinochet regime would not cooperate in the Letelier murder prosecution, and invited Chile to take part in joint naval exercises. And it did that while denouncing "international terrorism."

The Reagan Administration's Ambassador to the United Nations, Jeane Kirkpatrick, visited Chile and Argentina. She said they could give good advice to Central American countries on how to deal with guerrillas. Did she have in mind the murder of unarmed civilians?

Or consider El Salvador. The first major Reagan Administration initiative in foreign policy was to send military aid to the Salvador junta, declaring the rebels to be a major Communist threat. The widely-reported brutalities of the Government forces, including mass murders, drew little criticism from Washington. When three Catholic nuns and a lay worker were murdered, Secretary of State Haig suggested—without evidence—that the victims might have tried to run a roadblock and might have shot at the killers.

"Our Government and those of our allies," President Reagan said the other day, "have expressed moral revulsion at the police-state tactics of Poland's oppressors. The church has also spoken out in spite of threats and intimidation.

That statement would apply exactly to the official brutalities in Guatemala, Argentina, Chile, El Salvador—except that the United States has not expressed its moral revulsion. Many allied governments have been critical, and the church has been outspoken. The Reagan Administration has cuddled up to the oppressors.

Perfect consistency about human rights is not possible in an imperfect world. Whatever the flaws in the American record, we are right to speak up about Poland. But our words would carry more weight if we applied our values with equal determination in our own hemisphere.

MILITARY HARDWARE WON'T FIX BREAKDOWN IN EL SALVADOR

(By Cynthia Arnson)

On Dec. 15, the Department of Defense announced a major escalation of U.S. military commitment to El Salvador. In testimony before a Senate Foreign Relations subcommittee, Undersecretary of Defense Fred Ikle indicated that the United States would train 1,500 Salvadoran soldiers.

Close to 100 arrived at Ft. Bragg, N.C., on Jan. 9 to began basic infantry schooling with the Green Berets. And, despite the fact that Congress had just approved $26 million in military aid for El Salvador in the coming year, Ikle expressed hope that he could count on "the support of Congress" because "the cost of Salvadoran requirements far exceed planned fiscal year 1982 levels."

The timing of Ikle's announcement—scarcely two days before Congress adjourned for a month-long holiday recess—tells as much about this administration as it does about the military situation in El Salvador.

Ever since the Reagan administration declared last March that El Salvador was a "textbook case of Communist aggression" and announced a major increase in U.S. aid programs and the sending of non-combat military advisers, Congress has flooded the State Department and White House with resolutions, letters and amendments designed to moderate Reagan's cold war policy.

This year's foreign aid bill, signed by Reagan Dec. 29, ties provision of military aid to El Salvador to greater respect for human rights there, greater civilian control of the military, and movement toward a political, negotiated settlement.

Notably, the first certification from the administration regarding those conditions is due today, several weeks after the new training programs began. "This is not consultation," said one senior Senate aide. "We are simply being informed."

At issue, however, is far more than compliance with congressional mandates. While the provision of military aid to El Salvador is not new—Presidents Carter and Reagan have both made such aid a central feature of U.S. policy—the current proposals are alarming for two reasons.

First, they seem to confirm the Reagan administration's commitment to victory on the battlefield as a substitute for a political solution that involves all contending forces. Second, in the wake of reports last summer and early fall that the Salvadoran army and the guerrillas had reached a "stalemate" that would eventually favor the rebel side, this new round of military involvement threatens to involve the United States in a protracted and spiraling commitment to defeat the Salvadoran insurgents.

The scope of the current program—many times the number of students trained in the previous fiscal year—reflects the level of official concern over the strength of the Salvadoran opposition.

Part of the guerrilla offensive has involved a campaign of economic sabotage, which Asst. Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs Thomas Enders called "systematic destruction of the economic infrasture * * * to bleed the country."

A look at the list of weapons provided by the United States, however, shows the kind of American contribution to the ravaging of the Salvadoran countryside. In addition to 52,010 hand fragmentation grenades, 508 grenade launchers, thousands of machine guns, and hundreds of heavy mortars and recoilless rifles, U.S. aid now includes over 200 500-pound bombs and 100 of the 750-pound sort.

All this to be used in a country that is often referred to as "about the size of Massachusetts."

In a situation of war, both sides get arms, and the Reagan administration has recently made renewed accusations of Cuban and Nicaraguan involvement in the weapons flow to the guerrillas. Using the rebels' alleged foreign support as justification for expanding U.S. programs, however, contains a pitfall: It virtually guarantees that the guerrillas will redouble their efforts to ensure adequate supplies. This will only intensify, not settle the war, which has already claimed 30,000 victims and displaced some 13 percent of the Salvadoran population.

Officials of the Reagan administration have endorsed a political solution for El Salvador that centers around elections for a Constituent Assembly to be held in March. They have also criticized the opposition Revolutionary Democratic Front for its refusal to participate.

It could be, however, that Washington memories are short. Last March, just as election plans were being drawn up, the Salvadoran army issued a hit-list of 138 "subversives" and "traitors to the fatherland." The list included the names of church officials, human rights activists and priests, as well as most of the opposition figures which the State Department would now like to see returned to El Salvador to "campaign freely."

Elections will not end the war, nor will increased military aid, though it will increase the suffering. How much more sense it would make to cease upping the military ante and lay the groundwork for a true political solution, one that involves dialog and participation by all parties to the conflict, especially those with the guns.

PRIEST FEARS NEW VIETNAM FOR U.S.

(By Barbara Schechter)

The words poured out and the priest's strong voice rose.

He was frustrated, he said, because words could only touch the surface of what he had seen.

"When I talk about this subject, I get emotional. It burns my innards out. I see people dying all over the place."

After 30 years in Central America, the Rev. Albert Reymann does not mince words. The region is being torn apart, he said—and the United States is playing a key role in the destruction, a role that is reminiscent of its Vietnam policy of the 1960's.

The Akron native contends the U.S. government has concocted a dangerous foreign policy based on a false premise: Soviet influence will spread through Latin America like a contagious disease.

"In truth," he said, "if you want communism in Central America and all of Latin America, keep up with what you're doing now, and you'll get it."

Reymann, 61, a Maryknoll priest, is in Akron for the holidays. He has spent five years in El Salvador and 25 in Guatemala, working with poverty-stricken peasants and Indians in remote villages.

This year, because of illness, he was ordered to return to the United States.

He hopes to be back in Central America in the spring. Until then, he is living in Philadelphia and speaking to East Coast audiences about Central America.

Reymann's talks rend U.S. policy toward the two countries in which he has spent most of his adult life.

The United States has made communism a false issue, one that may backfire by pushing those seeking freedom toward the Soviet Union, Reymann said during an interview at a niece's home in Ellet.

He said he never encountered a communist during his 30 years in El Salvador and Guatemala. "There are more communists in Summit County than there are in Central America," he said.

"It's a horrible injustice to pick on El Salvador and make it the meeting place between East and West. It's not guilty of it."

While Reymann recuperates, he maintains almost daily contact with Latin America.

Clashes between government and opposition forces in El Salvador are growing, he said, and the opposition forces—whom he called "freedom fighters"—are gaining ground.

In El Salvador, a country the size of Massachusetts, guerrilla forces control about one-third of the territory.

Reymann said he does not expect the Salvadoran junta headed by President Jose Napolean Duarte to survive.

Elections scheduled for March are viewed as "a farce" by most people because opposition candidates have been barred, the priest said.

He predicted that the Salvadoran opposition will win the civil war within six months; their Guatemalan counterparts, in one year—unless the United States intervenes.

The priest is worried about that. Based upon what he has seen of U.S. policy so far, he said he fears the seeds are planted for another Vietnam:

U.S. aid—"It buys military hardware. I've never seen aid getting down to the people."

U.S. military advisers—"They're the guys behind the guys pulling the triggers."

Agrarian reform—"It has never happened. The government sells the worst land to peasants at rates they can't afford."

Reymann, a political scientist, sees the struggle in Central America not as a U.S.-Soviet showdown, but as a challenge to U.S. hemispheric domination.

The priest said Latin nations are evolving economically and politically and their resentment of U.S.-backed military governments is growing.

The changes may result in socialist countries in Central America because the people associate U.S. democracy with their subjugation, Reymann said.

"We have to learn to be comfortable with socialism," he said. "In no way will these countries go democratic."

Those who survive the political turmoil seldom live beyond 40 because of disease and hunger, the priest said. Nearly half of the children die before the age of 5.

Young Guatemalan boys continue to be arrested and forced into the army. Reymann also said there is torture: men hung by their genitals, women by their breasts.

"We've had a lot of people just blown apart. Others are kidnapped. They disappear, which means they're dead."

Reymann worked in the hills and small Indian "pueblos," or villages, serving as parish pastor. Using a horse or pickup truck, he would drive around the vast parish of up to 50,000 people.

He continually held leadership, or "conscious-raising," classes, getting people to think about their lack of food, health care, housing and limited future.

"The bottom line," he said, "was always, 'What are you going to do about it?'

"Christianity, if it's anything, is political, economical, social. It says you're a free person. You have a destiny that is not to be a slave."

Priests in Guatemala and El Salvador have died for teaching that. Reymann knew Bishop Oscar Romero, the murdered Salvadoran church leader who had urged his countrymen to seek a better life.

There are places to which Reymann cannot return because his life would be in danger.

But he is ready to go back to Central America. "Life here is very trying," he said. "The most difficult thing is the lack of comprehension of what's going on down there."

INTRODUCTION OF RESOLUTIONS DEALING WITH CONGRESSIONAL PAY

(Mr. DENARDIS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. DENARDIS. Mr. Speaker, in 1977, the House voted to limit the amount of outside earned income which a Member could receive each year to 15 percent of his or her annual congressional salary and to limit the amount a Member may receive in a single honorarium to $1,000. This measure passed the House by a vote of 344 to 79, a margin of more than 4 to 1. At that time, the Speaker praised these limitations as "the heart and soul of the entire (ethical reforms) package."

On October 28, 1981, the House considered a resolution to raise the outside earned income limitation to 40 percent of a Member's annual salary and to increase the limit on a single honorarium to $2,000. During debate, a Member who supported the measure and believed the majority of his colleagues did, too, said the following: "Someone said we should not try to pass it on a voice vote. I agree with that. I think there ought to be a vote." Well, after more than 2 hours of thorough debate, there was a recorded vote. And it showed that the Members of the House of Representatives opposed the increase by 271 to 147, a margin of almost 2 to 1.

Just a few weeks later, on December 15, 1981, a resolution to double the limitation on outside earned income was again brought up for consideration. But this time there was no recorded vote. There was no debate; there were barely enough Members on the floor to conduct a debate. There was not even a reading of the bill. It was just a quick call on the part of one of my colleagues for unanimous consent, and even quicker call by the presiding officer for ayes and noes, and that was it. The resolution, as it says in the RECORD, was agreed to. The whole process took about 8 seconds—I saw the video recording. In just 8 seconds, the will of the Congress, and, if you believe in representative government, the will of the people, was overturned.

Mr. Speaker, this was a cowardly and deceitful act. Cowardly because those who arranged it were afraid of facing their opposition; maybe they feared defeat, maybe they feared exposing their desires to cash in on the position of U.S. Congressmen, but they were afraid. And deceitful because they slid the resolution through quickly and surreptitiously, knowing the majority of their colleagues opposed it.

This sort of practice, if allowed to continue, will undermine the principles of representative government. Like many of my colleagues, I have cosponsored measures to rescind the increase on outside earned income. But it is not enough that we reverse the action: we must insure that it is never carried out in the same devious way again. Today, Mr. Speaker, I am introducing two resolutions to insure that it is not.

I am introducing today two resolutions to insure that we do not deal with these matters in the devious way in which we dealt with them in 1981. Resolution No. 1 would require that any matter which adjusts the pay or adjusts the limitations on outside earned income be acted on subsequent to at least a 24-hour announcement before putting the question.

The second resolution would require that a motion to reconsider any matter which adjusts the pay or affects the limitations on outside earned income shall not be entertained until at least 1 hour after the announcement of the vote on such bill or resolution.

Mr. Speaker, I have joined with others to rescind or alter what we have done, but I think it is extremely important that we make procedural changes so that we deal with these questions in a more forthright fashion.

Mr. Speaker, I include the two resolutions as follows, and I ask that the Rules Committee move promptly on these measures.

H. RES. —

Resolution to amend the Rules of the House of Representatives regarding the consideration in the House of a bill or resolution which adjusts the pay or affects the limitations on outside earned income of Members

Resolved, That rule VIII of the Rules of the House of Representatives is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following new clause:

"4. (a) It shall not be in order in the House to put the question upon final passage or adoption, as the case may be, of a bill or resolution which adjusts the rate of pay of Members or affects the limitations on outside earned income as set forth in rule XLVII until the first calendar day after the Speaker or the chairman of the committee with subject matter jurisdiction of the bill or resolution makes an announcement in the House during its sitting summarizing the provisions which would adjust such rate of pay or affect such limitations. In no event may such announcement occur less than twenty-four hours before the putting of the question.

"(b) The Speaker shall not entertain any unanimous consent request to consider a bill or resolution not otherwise in order under paragraph (a).".

H. RES. —

Resolution to amend the Rules of the House of Representatives with respect to the disposition of a motion to reconsider a voice vote on final passage of legislation which adjusts the pay or affects the limitations on outside earned income of Members

Resolved, That rule XVIII of the Rules of the House of Representatives is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following new clause:

"3. (a) A motion to reconsider a voice vote on final passage or adoption, as the case may be, of a bill or resolution which adjusts the rate of pay of Members or affects the limitations on outside earned income as set forth in rule XLVII shall not be entertained until at least one hour after the announcement of the vote on such bill or resolution.

"(b) The Speaker shall not entertain any unanimous consent request to consider a motion not otherwise in order under paragraph (a).".

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. LEVITAS) is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. LEVITAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may defer to the gentleman from New York (Mr. WEISS) and reserve my time following the gentleman from New York's remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

WHO WILL SPEAK FOR THE CHILDREN?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York (Mr. WEISS) is recognized for 60 minutes.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks and include extraneous material on the subject of my special order today.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, I have requested this special order today on behalf of this Nation's single greatest resource, our 64 million children. It is they who will suffer the most from this administration's determined assault on the Nation's social welfare programs.

□ 1300

Who, after all, are the truly needy? The single largest group are children. More children live below the poverty line than any other age group in America. Yet these victims of the administration's penury cannot vote against those who would wrest from them the meager resources with which they have been provided.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEISS. I would be delighted at this point to yield to the distinguished gentleman from Illinois (Mr. SIMON).

Mr. SIMON. I thank my colleague, the gentleman from New York, and I commend him for his focus on this problem.

Let me, if I may, just take a couple of minutes here to indicate that, particularly in the area of school lunches, we face a major problem in this country.

Let me just take the State of Illinois as an example. We are now serving 3 million fewer lunches per day nationwide. In the State of Illinois we are losing $20 million. In my congressional district, the poorest district in the State of Illinois in terms of average annual income, we are losing $2½ million a year. If we were to lose a $2½ million industry, it would make headlines. But in fact that is what we are doing. And the people who suffer the loss are the poorest children. Seventy-six school districts in the State of Illinois have dropped school lunches. Over 500 nationally have dropped them.

It sounds good, in theory, to say, "We are going to make middle-income people pay a little more for school lunches." And if that would be the only impact of it, I would not object, I would not get very excited about, it, because I would like to go back and tell the people of my district and the people of the Nation that we have done something other than take lunches away from school children. But in fact what happens is that, as the middle-income students' lunch costs rise, they go to McDonalds, they bring their lunch to school, and they have alternatives. And then the school finds it is too expensive to maintain the program, and the program gets dropped. And who is hurt? It is the very poor, because we know that tests clearly show that if you do not eat adequately you are not going to learn very well. They are the people who suffer under this program. Tragically for this Nation, those people, many of them, the only good meal they get every day is that meal they get when they go to school, that school lunch.

Mr. Speaker, I would simply join my colleague, the gentleman from New York, in his protest in what is happening. Somehow we have to forge an economic program for this Nation and use budget restraints. We need restraints. I serve on the Budget Committee. We need restraint, but we do not need to do it by taking food away from poor children of this country, and that is one of the things we are doing now.

Mr. Speaker, Federal support for the school lunch program in the current fiscal year has been cut by $1 billion or 35 percent. Nationwide, 3 million fewer lunches per day are being served to schoolchildren. In Illinois, cutbacks to the school lunch program have resulted in a loss of $23 million across the State; and in my congressional district, the loss is almost $2½ million.

These cuts have been devastating to the schoolchildren of America. Although administration officials have stated that these cuts would not weaken the safety net, this could not be further from the truth.

Let me illustrate the severity of these cuts with information received in a field hearing of the Subcommittee on Elementary and Secondary Education held in my district on January 16, 1982.

Federal cuts have been implemented in a number of ways. First, the subsidies to the school systems have been substantially reduced. Second, the criteria for families to be eligible for reduced-price or free lunches have been tightened. For example, to qualify for a child's free school lunch, a family of four must earn less than $10,990 as opposed to the previous limit of $11,640. Similarly, to qualify for a reduced-price lunch, a family of four must earn less than $15,630 (as opposed to the previous standard of $17,820).

Furthermore, attention should be focused on the families whose children have not been receiving reduced-price or free school lunches, but instead have been paying the full price for the meal. These families, now facing higher prices for lunch, have stopped buying school lunches altogether. In the State of Illinois, of the 145,000 lunches no longer being served, 138,000 of these, or 95 percent, were to fully paying families. This suggests that the price increases are particularly hurting the working poor—families who do not qualify for the reduced-price lunches, but whose incomes cannot tolerate the new hike in lunch prices.

The large drop in the numbers of children participating in the school lunch program is perpetuating a vicious circle. School systems are receiving less money from both the Federal Government and now from paying families. However, the costs to the schools—electricity, heat, janitorial services—remain the same. As more and more schools go into the red, many have simply stopped serving lunches. In the State of Illinois alone, 76 schools have dropped out of the school lunch program. Nationwide, the toll is currently 500 schools.

When schools stop serving lunches altogether, the hardest hit are once again the neediest children. At this time, 1 million needy children are no longer receiving lunch, often their only good meal each day. Another ominous result of the closing of lunch programs is the unemployment of those people who prepared and served the meals. In Illinois alone, 4,000 people have already lost their jobs, and it is estimated that an additional 10,000 cooks and servers will also be laid off.

With all the current focus on budget deficits, we must not lose sight of the reason for the school lunch program in the first place. Good nutrition is vital for the livelihood of our children. Studies show that hungry children do not do as well in school. The job of the schools is to teach, not to feed, but we have learned the hard way that there is a relationship between the two. The early school years are a critical time to start our children on the road to good learning.

As we prepare to receive the President's budget next week, we cannot emphasize enough that the current cuts have already been too severe. State and local governments do not have the resources to compensate for Federal retrenchment.

We never should have allowed these budget cuts to have been approved last year. There is not one of us who was not inundated with post cards last year urging our support for the President's budget and tax policies—a campaign that was organized, for the most part, by those outside of our congressional districts. I believe this type of pressure pales when put up against the health and security of our children. I would hope that more of us would find the courage to stand up to additional attacks on the school lunch program the administration has already proposed for the coming fiscal year.

Mr. WEISS. I thank the gentleman for his very eloquent comments and for his contribution to this discussion.

President Reagan has suggested that families "vote with their feet" if they are dissatisfied with their State's social programs.

I wonder if he has stopped to consider the massive disruption that such moves would cause in the lives of children who would be forced to leave behind families, friends, and familiar surroundings.

The President has reassured us repeatedly, if unconvincingly, that the private sector would take over the support of those social programs that are being abandoned by the Federal Government. But is he not indulging in wishful thinking? How can the corporate sector, whose charitable donations totaled less than $3 billion in 1980, replace the over $40 billion slashed from social programs last year alone?

Resources have rarely trickled down from the haves to the have-nots. The 9½ million unemployed Americans cannot depend on the notoriously unreliable tricklings from above.

Unemployment tears at our Nation's social fabric. Not only do the children of the unemployed eat more poorly and dress less well than their more fortunate peers, they are also more often subject to abuse by tension-ridden parents, witnesses to the beatings of their mothers, and likely to be in ill health.

Although we pride ourselves on being a child-centered and oriented country, sadly the facts speak otherwise. Our infant mortality rate does not even rank among the world's top 10. Whereas only 90 of 10,000 Japanese children die before their first birthday, 130 of 10,000 American children do. And the well-being of our minority children is even more scandalous. Twice as many nonwhite American infants die during their first year of life as white infants.

Investing in children requires extraordinary faith and patience. Some harvests may not be reaped for 15 years or more. For example, it was only recently that we learned how preschoolers, who had participated in the early Head Start program of the 1960's, have been more likely to finish school than their non-Head Start peers and less likely to have needed costly special education services.

The administration has launched a massive assault on this Nation's social programs and its clients. Bandied about are accusations of excessive Government generosity, and the calls are heard for putting welfare clients to work. But who are these recipients of supposedly excessive Government largesse? Over one-half of the food stamp recipients are actually children. Similarily, over 70 percent of aid to families with dependent children clients are children. Only 1 percent of those receiving AFDC benefits are men, fathers who are either temporarily unemployed or who are disabled. The rest are mothers, many of them with preschool age children.

Whom, then, are we putting to work? If the Government would require mothers of young children to work, why have we heard no administration proposals for the expansion of day-care services that would be needed to care for the children of these women?

Who, may we ask, will care for the children?

One could hardly say that the AFDC families are enriching themselves at the Government's expense, despite rhetorical insinuations to that effect. A family of four receives a grand total of only $120 per month in Mississippi and $569 in Oregon, the most generous State.

It is the rare family that does not abhor the dependency and degradation that is often associated with being a welfare client. Children, in particular, suffer when peers tease them about their welfare status.

Let me read to you the words of a Connecticut welfare mother, and I am quoting:

> Before my children went to school, they thought they were like all other children. What they wore didn't make any difference to them. Then they started school, and as small as they were, they found out they were different. Some little children, not realizing what they were saying, would poke fun at their clothes or make fun of my sons because they needed haircuts. Then all you have tried to protect them from starts building resentment in them. I have tried to explain things to them but they are too small. So all I can do is try to make the hurts easier for them. Many times my daughter will come home from school in tears because the children tell her she is poor because she is on welfare. So now "welfare" is a dirty word for her. Many a tear I have shed for the pain my children suffer because of the word "welfare" but until I can change it, the tears will flow.

Recent changes in AFDC regulations will eliminate policies that have been successful in helping these mothers work themselves off the AFDC rolls. From now on, however, they will be unable to keep 30 cents of each dollar they earn. Now for every dollar they earn, a full AFDC dollar will be eliminated from their grants.

President Reagan appears to believe that only the wealthy and powerful can benefit from incentives for productivity. Does he really believe that low-income Americans are a different species?

It is not only from the children of the poor that he is withdrawing support; children of middle-class families will also suffer from the effects of the recent budget cutting orgy.

Federal funds for elementary and secondary education have been slashed. More requests for cuts are expected. Yet, the great majority of American children (89 percent) attend our public schools and benefit from this support. Middle-class youngsters will find it increasingly difficult, and, in some cases even impossible, to attend college because of major reductions in the amount of available student aid. Many students whose families' incomes fall between $14,000 and $27,000 will no longer be eligible for student aid.

Mr. PEYSER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEISS. I yield to my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PEYSER. I thank the gentleman for yielding, and I want to thank him also for taking the time and for reiterating the impact on children and on the poor that the President and the administration are now inflicting, and particularly the area the gentleman is now talking about which deals with the question of student aid.

When the President, as the gentleman knows, first took office, he said that one of the aims was to move this country ahead with greater technological skills and to improve the productivity of this country.

Well, for most countries around the world that is accomplished by education, and by more education and by giving the opportunity to those who are academically qualified to attend school at the elementary and secondary level and then on to the postsecondary level of college and technical school. And that has been the great fortune of the United States over the last 20 or 30 years. We have moved ahead in this area. And now, suddenly, in one fell swoop last year, we have made a dramatic cut in the programs that have enabled our young people to attend college, our young people to go on to graduate school and get these skills that they so need.

As the gentleman also knows, the administration has just announced its intention to eliminate graduate students, who would probably have to be considered among our most accomplished students in the country, to eliminate them from the only student aid program that they have had available, which has been the guaranteed student loan.

Now, the impact of this on our country I think is going to be tremendous. Everything that we are doing in Government today, this great increase in defense spending, all calls for greater technological skills. And here we are, removing thousands and thousands of people, young people, from this opportunity.

In a recent hearing—in fact in a hearing just this morning—members from the education community testified that in New York State alone over 85,000 students would be impacted by this, that graduate schools all over the country could have cuts in their student population of 30 to 40 percent by next year if we eliminate these students from these programs.

So, I think that it is important in taking this special order of highlighting some of these things and to, if nothing else, awaken the country and awaken our colleagues in the Congress so that we do not give in on this really outrageous move and that we continue to help young people to make our own country strong.

I want to thank the gentleman for yielding this time and again congratulate him for taking this type of special order.

Mr. WEISS. I thank the gentleman for his very important contribution.

I yield to my distinguished friend, the gentleman from Washington (Mr. BONKER).

Mr. BONKER. I thank the gentleman and I would like to commend him for his efforts to call attention to issues that pertain to children which I think represents a foundation of this great country.

Mr. Speaker, during the first year of the Reagan administration, we have witnessed repeated threats to the health and educational needs of handicapped children—in short, to their basic constitutional rights.

Early in the year, for example, there were efforts to repeal Public Law 94-142, the Education for All Handicapped Children Act. This law, enacted in 1975, insures all children in this Nation a free and appropriate public education suitable to their individual learning needs. Efforts to repeal Public Law 94-142 did not succeed but instead drew sharp criticism from concerned citizens and legislators who argued that the repeal of this law would undermine a decade of progress for handicapped children and their families.

Very soon, another attack on Public Law 94-142 was launched, this time to rob the law of its potency by removing key requirements, such as:

The Individualized Education Plan, known popularly as the IEP;

The rights of parents to be involved in the development of their child's educational program; and

The procedural safeguards (due process) that enable parents to challenge inappropriate programs or placements for their handicapped child.

These dismantling efforts were also defeated, but the program was soon injeopardy again. This time it was the administration's budget proposal that funding for education of the handicapped be included in the block grants to local education agencies (LEA's). This effort, too, was defeated, but only for the time being. Future attempts will be made to alter this important program and these must also be turned aside for a number of reasons.

Funding education of the handicapped out of general education block grants made to the States for their overall education needs would surely result in a scramble for funds already reduced by 25 percent to 38 percent or more. Such a scramble would be most unfair to handicapped children and their families. A recent GAO study clearly demonstrates that this type of competition for resources under a block grant program to the States would lead to inadequate or inappropriate programs for many special-needs children. This study shows that the State in which a child lives affects the quality of education that a child receives. The study also indicates that school districts with fewer resources are likely to exclude handicapped children from receiving special educational services.

Another serious curtailment of services to the handicapped will occur through the removal of Federal regulations responsible for tracking the States' education money. Because the States will be required to do no reporting, there is no assurance that handicapped children will be served at all in a given State under a block grant system. The repeal of this reporting requirement, if allowed, amounts to a virtual abandonment of Federal leadership on behalf of handicapped children.

In the State of Washington, for example, legislators have taken a cue from the Federal block grant fever. They have applied the principle at their State level by combining a variety of programs for special-needs children into a single block grant. Though it is thought that nearly the same numbers of children are being served, it is certain that services are, or soon will be, seriously cutback under that kind of funding pattern.

This block grant move at the State level is being challenged by several local school districts. Serious questions have come up regarding the legality of the plan, in that funding for handicapped programs under current law is allocated on a categorical basis—that is, handicap by handicap, such as deaf, blind, mentally retarded, and so on. Several suits are pending against the State by the various educational agencies serving these handicapped children. These organizations recognize that such an allocation of funds will not allow them to serve handicapped children adequately, according to existing laws still in effect.

Even if this block grant action in the State of Washington does fail, and other actions that undermine programs for the handicapped in other States are turned back, additional threats to programs for education of the handicapped are on the horizon. Most recent is a plan from OMB for fiscal year 1983 which proposes a block grant made up of moneys for several special programs for handicapped, institutionalized, gifted, and other special students. A current estimate is that this proposal will result in as much as a 65 percent reduction in funds for special programs for children in need of specific kinds of educational services.

Those of us who believe in the constitutional rights of every member of our society to a free public education cannot sit by and watch the legislative gains of the last two decades be wiped out. Education of the handicapped has proven itself to be a wise investment in preserving human worth as well as societies' dollars. Legislation that supports the education of the handicapped must be preserved and adequate funding must be made available if we are not to incur greater expenditures than ever. Children whom we have failed to educate cannot assume their rightful place as first-class citizens who have been given the opportunity to become self-sufficient and productive, each according to his or her own potential.

Mr. WEISS. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

Although the President contends that increased defense spending is needed to attain military and technological superiority over the Soviets, his diminished support for our children works at cross-purposes to his stated goal.

Last year, the National Science Foundation budget for science education was all but eliminated while Soviet children already are receiving education in science and mathematics that is far superior to ours. Many of our school systems cannot find enough qualified math and science teachers, and so rely on instructors who are not qualified in these fields.

How can this Nation expect to cope with, no less excel in, an increasing technological world if we do not provide our young citizens with the tools they must have to face tomorrow?

The shortsighted economic policies of our President, who last year was positively evangelical about the need to balance the budget, and who this year wants fervently to dismantle Federal programs that protect the general welfare, are mortgaging the future of all of America's children.

This past week, we honored the memory of Franklin Delano Roosevelt, who in his second inaugural address, said:

> We have always known that heedless self-interest was bad morals. We know now that it is bad economics.

The greed to which F. D. R. alluded 45 years ago is with us still. Why else the great disparity in levels of generosity to the needy among our 50 States? The children of this Nation cannot afford to gamble on supply-side economics or on the new federalism. The odds are weighted too heavily against them. Our characteristically generous and compassionate Nation is today failing what Hubert Humphrey called the moral test of government: How it treats those who are in the dawn of life—the children; those who are in the twilight of life—the aged; and those who are in the shadows of life—the sick, the needy, and the handicapped.

Mr. Speaker, today's edition of the Washington Post, carries on the front page, by a leak or advanced release, if you will, a story which fills in some of the gaps of the President's state of the Union message delivered last week.

Last week's message made no mention at all as to what was going to happen this year, what the President would be proposing for the fiscal 1983 budget; how he would deal with the economy; how he would deal with the budget deficit; how he would deal with the extremely high levels of unemployment.

Well, not all the gaps are filled in but we are beginning to see now how he apparently seeks, wrongheadedly, to cut back on some of the deficits and, of course, he is going to take some more out the hides of those who can afford it least.

The story in today's Washington Post suggests that new cuts are to be achieved by the creation of some eight new block grants and funding for those new grants is to be some 30 to 75 percent lower than the current level for funding for the specific programs which would be included there.

The eight new block grants, according to the story, would cover Federal programs for employment and training, vocational and adult education, education for the handicapped, rehabilitation services, child welfare, energy and emergency assistance, rental rehabilitation, and the administration of welfare programs.

In addition to that, there is a clear-cut indication that there is going to be an additional cut of some $2 billion from medicaid for a reduction of 10 percent, $2.4 billion to be cut from the food stamp program, and $1.2 billion cut from the AFDC program, a quarter of a billion dollars to be cut from elementary, secondary, and vocational education, a cut of 23 percent overall. The budget will propose cutting aid to education by nearly a third and vocational education by nearly a half. In the field of nutrition, the women's infants' and children's program, which avoided consolidation into the block last year because of the action of the Congress, is targeted for a 25-percent reduction and consolidation into existing maternal and child health block grants.

It is obvious that if the children of this Nation are to be protected, this Congress has its work cut out for it.

It is obvious that the children cannot expect gentle or kind treatment at the hands of the President or the administration.

I hope and I urge that this Congress will be up to the task of preventing further deprivation and further erosion of programs which barely provide sufficient assistance for children today.

The additional sections which I have in my prepared statement, which I will ask to be included in the RECORD which I previously made, were prepared in conjunction with Dr. Helen Rauch, a congressional fellow assigned to my office from the Society for Research in Child Development. They provide an overview of Federal laws and programs that affect children and discuss some of the recent changes in the regulations and budgets.

Not meant to be exhaustive, they cover the following topics: Education, nutrition, child care, children poverty, health care, adolescence, the mistreatment of children, and the documentation of policy effects.

Mr. Speaker, I ask that today's story in the Washington Post, entitled "New Budget Seeks Deep Cuts in Basic Social Programs," written by Herbert H. Denton and Robert G. Kaiser, be included in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

[From the Washington Post, Feb. 2, 1982]

NEW BUDGET SEEKS DEEP CUTS IN BASIC SOCIAL PROGRAMS

(By Herbert H. Denton and Robert G. Kaiser)

The new budget President Reagan will send to Congress next week calls for deep new cuts in Medicaid, food stamps, subsidized housing, welfare, aid to education and many other of the basic federal social programs, according to a partial draft of the budget obtained by the Washington Post.

Judging by this draft—which is theoretically subject to additional revisions, though officials say none are being made—President Reagan has decided to reopen nearly all the fiercest budget battles that he fought last spring, including many that he lost.

For example, the new budget calls for wiping out the Economic Development Administration, a popular public works program that will provide localities with $198 million in the current fiscal year, which was saved last year largely by moderate Republicans in the House.

The budget also contemplates cuts in the future cost of retirement benefits for federal civilian and military employees and deep future cuts in the Medicare program for the elderly and disabled. The Medicare cut would amount to $16 billion a year by fiscal 1987, a much larger sum than previous reports had suggested the administration was aiming for in this costly program.

The documents obtained by the Post say that under the 1983 budget federal aid to state and local governments would be kept at about the level of 1974 in terms of purchasing power. That is about the same level as this year.

The documents also say that many of the new budget cuts would be achieved by creating eight new block grants in which existing federal programs would be consolidated and then funded through grants to the states. These grants would be considerably lower—as much as 30 to 75 percent—than the current level of funding for the specific programs involved.

Such cuts, if enacted by Congress, would dramatically shrink a wide range of federal programs before they would be turned over entirely to the states under Reagan's proposed New Federalism program.

However, leading members of Congress have already said publicly that the House and Senate are unlikely to approve anything like the reductions Reagan will propose in this new budget.

Many of the cuts outlined in the draft budget documents have been previously reported, often without precise figures. This is the first time the total impact of the administration's proposals for 1983 can be seen in one place. The budget to be unveiled formally next week will propose these cuts:

$2 billion from the Medicaid program in which states and the federal government jointly pay health care costs for the poor. This would represent about a 10 percent reduction.

$2.4 billion from food stamp program, the government's second costliest welfare program (Medicaid is first).

The termination of all new commitments under the government's subsidized housing programs. The new budget calls for expenditures of $3.8 billion on these programs for fiscal 1983, which is money committed in earlier years, but would not permit any new projects.

$1.2 billion from the main cash welfare program, Aid to Families with Dependent Children. The President will propose reducing the federal share of AFDC expenditures from $8 billion in the current fiscal year to $5.1 billion next year, a reduction of 36 percent at a time when welfare rolls are growing because of poor economic conditions.

$1.4 billion from federal aid for elementary, secondary and vocational education, a cut of 23 percent. Overall, the new budget will propose cutting aid to education by nearly a third, and aid for vocational education by nearly half.

$500 million in savings on the federal civil servants' retirement program. The documents obtained by The Post do not explain how the administration will propose to reduce the costs of civil service retirement, but they show that by 1987 the White House hopes to have accomplished savings on these pensions totaling $1.9 billion a year.

$2.2 billion from other government retirement programs, $2 billion from the railroad retirement fund. The President will also propose changing military retirement pay to save $100 million next year and more in later years.

$600 million—or 16 percent—from federal aid for urban mass transportation. The President will propose eliminating all federal aid for new construction of mass transit systems and will ask to phase out all operating subsidies over the next three years.

The President's budget includes many other cuts, and freezes many programs at current spending levels—the federal highway program, for example.

On the big entitlement programs, according to this draft document, Reagan will propose total reductions of $11.8 billion for fiscal 1983, rising quickly to $16.5 billion in 1984 and $33 billion in 1987. This does not include any cuts in the Social Security program, the largest of the entitlements, which is not mentioned in this year's budget cuts.

The draft documents obtained by The Post outline eight new block grants to consolidate existing categorical grant programs and then fund them at significantly lower levels. The president also proposes adding to four existing block grants some programs that Congress refused to include in them last year. One of these is the nutrition program for women, infants and children (WIC), which the president suggests cutting by about one fourth.

The eight new block grants the president proposes would cover federal programs for employment and training, vocational and adult education, education for the handicapped, rehabilitation services, child welfare, energy and emergency assistance, rental rehabilitation and the administration of welfare programs.

In each of these cases, Reagan will propose overall spending markedly lower than the budget authority given to the categorical grant programs that these block grants would replace.

For example, the rental rehabilitation grant would substitute for the existing Section 8 rehabilitation program and a loan fund that are now funded at a level of $612 million. But Reagan proposes allocating $150 million to the new block grant.

A child welfare block grant that Reagan will propose would combine programs for foster care, adoption assistance and others. The president's block grant would be $65 million less than the $445 million earmarked for the affected programs in the current budget.

A block grant for employment and training would incorporate the four remaining programs under the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act, but would fund them at nearly 20 percent less than those programs now receive. The change would eliminate salaries paid to persons enrolled in job training programs.

EDUCATION

The basis of a sound democracy is an educated and informed electorate. Of the 43,766,000 school-aged American children between the ages of 5 and 17 who are enrolled in school, approximately 90 percent attend public schools.

The Federal role in public education has been the prime target of attacks by the administration as it tries to dismantle the Department of Education and undermine its programs. In general, Federal elementary and secondary education programs lost 12 percent of their funds between fiscal years 1981 and 1982.

Among the most prominent Federal efforts in the area of elementary and secondary education is title I of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act and Public Law 94-142, the Education for All Handicapped Children Act.

TITLE I

Title I, a 17-year-old program that has provided funds to State agencies for supplementary and compensatory services for educationally disadvantaged children, serves 5.4 million children in 68 percent of the Nation's public schools. This program, which the Reagan administration tried to abolish last year, has been found to be "effective" and "successful" in an evaluation conducted by the Department of Education. The study, it has been reported, found that "a 15-year decline in educational achievement is beginning to reverse, particularly among low-achieving groups." Apparently, children receiving title I services progressed faster in elementary school reading and mathematics classes than other disadvantaged students.

Although the administration did not succeed in block-granting title I last year, its funds have been reduced by 22 percent from $3.1 billion in fiscal year 1981 to $2.4 billion in fiscal year 1982. It has been reported that the Office of Management and Budget will propose further cutbacks in this program to $1.5 billion.

EDUCATING HANDICAPPED CHILDREN

Over 4.1 million school-aged children are handicapped and require some kind of special education. Of these children, some 220,000 are still waiting to be evaluated and some 120,00 already evaluated are waiting for proper placements.

The Education for All Handicapped Children Act (Public Law 94-142) guarantees handicapped children a legal right to an appropriate education as well as to related special educational services. Administration proposals to block grant this program would wipe out years of targeted Federal efforts to remedy the exclusion of, and discrimination against, poor and handicapped children in States and localities. Targeting, parent involvement, procedural safeguards, individual rights to services, and the maintenance of State and local efforts would be seriously undermined. Inclusion of these programs in a block grant would encourage a retreat to the early days of Federal aid being improperly used as general aid—spent for equipment and administration rather than to provide services to the neediest children.

NUTRITION

Despite what is known about the devastating effects of inadequate nutrition, the administration continues its offensive against programs that supplement the diets of children and pregnant women.

Hungry schoolchildren cannot give their full attention to schoolwork and often perform poorly as a result. For thousands of low-income children, the lunch they are served at school supplies them with one-third to one-half of their daily intake of nutrients. Nevertheless, $1 billion was cut from the budget of the national school lunch program which served 27 million children. The reductions, accomplished in part by phasing out subsidies to schools for children able to pay full price for their lunches, have already resulted in about 3 million children no longer being able to participate in a program that has been partially responsible for the marked decrease in children's malnutrition over the past decade. The elimination of the food service equipment assistance program after 1982, a program that provided grants-in-aid to schools with low-income populations for help in maintaining food service equipment, threatens feeding programs in low-income schools where major breakdowns in kitchen equipment may result in the discontinuation of school breakfast and lunch programs. The special milk program, which provides subsidies for children's milk in over 86,000 schools, child care institutions, and summer camps, will be restricted to schools having no lunch or breakfast program in 1982 and phased out altogether in 1983.

The ravages of poor nutrition, however, begin to take their toll even before children are born. Pregnant women who do not eat adequately and nutritionally more often deliver infants prematurely or have full-term babies that are extremely small. Although modern technology has enabled us to save more of these tiny infants, doctors cannot yet predict which of them will be left with major handicaps that can require lifetimes of medical expenses and special care. A study conducted by the Harvard School of Public Health demonstrated that for every dollar the Government spends on feeding low-income pregnant women, $3 can be saved on the expensive care provided in the newborn intensive care nursery.

Despite the documented importance of prenatal nutrition, the administration had proposed that the WIC program (special supplemental food program for women, infants, and children) be made part of the maternal and child health block grant, where its funding would have been cut by one-third, and the present 20 percent limit on administrative expenses eliminated.

The WIC program, which provides Federal funding for specified nutritious supplemental foods to pregnant, postpartum, and breast-feeding women, and to infants and children up to their fifth birthday who are determined to be at nutritional risk because of inadequate income or nutrition, deserves the support it has received from Congress. A study conducted by the Yale University School of Medicine showed that, for pregnant women participating in the WIC program, the number of infant deaths between 1975 and 1977 was 8.4 per 1,000, whereas that for non-WIC women in the study was 22.7 per 1,000 live births. It is feared that the elimination of the 20 percent WIC program limit on administrative expenses might result in WIC money being used for the administration of other urgent maternal and child health programs by States desperate for funds.

As the dollars available to low-income families for food diminishes, the threat of widespread malnutrition among the poor becomes a reality. A large survey which found that 20 percent of low-income teenagers had unacceptably low red blood cell counts, also found a direct relationship between a family's income and the calories, protein, and calcium consumed by its members.

CHILD CARE

Families are not always able to care for their children without outside assistance. Family emergencies may necessitate temporary placement of children in foster care. Often mothers of young children must work and need competent care for their children. In order to maintain their integrity, many American families depend on Government-supported day care or foster care.

DAY CARE

Approximately 30 million American children have mothers who work. The number of children under 6 whose mothers were in the labor force grew from 5.6 million in 1970 to 8.2 million in 1981, while the comparable figures for children between 7 and 15 years of age were 20 million in 1970 and 23.6 million in 1981. Most women work out of economic necessity. Nearly two-thirds are single, divorced, widowed, separated, or have husbands who earn less than $15,000 per year. Indeed, in 1981, the traditional family of husband, full-time mother, and two children comprised only 5 percent of all American families.

Demand for day care far outstrips the supply. The Administration for Children, Youth, and Families estimated that while there are about 6.1 million slots in family and center day care, there are approximately 13 million children under 14 whose mothers are working full time. There are estimated to be 6.7 million "latchkey" children in this country—youngsters at home without adult supervision.

Federal support for day care services amounts to billions of dollars each year. Yet, most of this money is not spent on the establishment of day care centers. In fact, the largest single source of support for day care services is indirect funding provided under the Internal Revenue Code, which allows families income tax deductions for work-related child care expenses. According to the 1982 Carter budget analysis, in 1980 about $885 million was spent under the provisions of the Tax Code which provides for a tax credit to families with children under 15 who have day care expenses related to their employment and/or education. Tax expenditures of over $1 billion were estimated for 1981.

Other sources of Federal funding for day care services include title XX of the Social Security Act which supports center care primarily, AFDC and food stamp "disregards" for day care costs, matching of State expenditures in federally assisted child welfare programs, day care as supportive service to the work incentive program (WIN), special programs authorized under the Elementary and Secondary Education Act servicing disadvantaged and migrant children, programs for handicapped children authorized under Public Law 94-142, the community development program, the Appalachian Regional Commission, programs administered by the Bureau of Indian Affairs, the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act (CETA), and the Small Business Administration which provides loans to operators of small profitmaking day care organizations.

The most significant administration policy affecting day care was the adoption of a new social services block grant that consolidated several individual programs—including title XX social services and child welfare services—and a budget for it that was only 75 percent of 1981 levels. In addition, States will no longer have to provide 25 percent in matching funds in order to receive their Federal share, nor will they have to develop periodic State plans.

The elimination of funding for public service employment under the CETA program withdrew a source of funds that supported a large number of persons working in day care centers. Reductions of 33 percent in the WIN program, limitation on child care deductions in AFDC and food stamp programs, and reduction in the child care food program will further limit active Federal participation in the provision of day care.

In holding to its avowed commitment to private initiatives, the Republican administration proposed in the Economic Recovery Act of 1981 several measures to liberalize the child care tax credit. The credit will be increased in calendar year 1982 to 30 percent for families with incomes of up to $10,000, decreasing by 1 percent for each additional $2,000 in income. For those with incomes above $28,000, the credit will remain at 20 percent. In addition, the amount for which the credit may be taken is increased to $2,400 for one dependent and to $4,800 for two or more dependents. Estimates for the cost of the child care tax credit changes are $19 million in 1982, $191 million in 1983, and $237 million in 1984.

The administration supports the concept of workfare, a program which requires welfare clients to work off their grants. Despite the fact that workfare programs would require thousands of mothers to work, no programs to increase day care services have been proposed by the President. More day care and after-school care is needed. Our current reliance on tax expenditures for financing day care cannot stimulate the additional high-quality day care services our youngest children need and deserve.

Head Start, since its inception in 1965, has provided not just day care, but health, educational, nutritional, and social services to almost 8 million children and families throughout the United States and its territories. Currently, the program serves 370,000 children—including over 40,000 handicapped children—in approximately 2,000 economically disadvantated communities, both urban and rural. The program employs some 70,000 persons in these communities, many of whom are Head Start parents and other low-income residents.

Intended primarily for preschoolers from low-income families, Head Start is designed to foster the development and well-being of children, thus enabling them to deal more effectively with their present environment and later responsibilities in school and community life. In order to accomplish this goal, Head Start programs emphasize cognitive and language development, social and emotional development, physical and mental health, and parent involvement. At the heart of Head Start's philosophy is the tenet that successful programs for children can be achieved and sustained only with the participation of parents. The program encourages them to participate in making decisions concerning local program policy by affording opportunities to serve on policy councils and other committees concerned with the planning and management of Head Start services.

Documentation of Head Start's effectiveness has recently been published in a study conducted by Dr. Irving Lazar, "The Persistence of Preschool Effects." The study documents that children enrolled in Head Start in the mid-1960's were less likely to drop out of school than their low-income counterparts, needed less special educational services, and demonstrated gains in achievement scores that persisted over time.

Although Head Start was initially included as one of President Reagan's social safety net programs, the designation did not preclude Mr. Stockman from proposing its elimination late in 1981. Although the President subsequently reiterated his support for this successful program, other administration actions again threaten its integrity.

The significant reductions made in CETA programs last year resulted in the elimination of 6,000 Head Start workers who served as teachers, aids, busdrivers, and clerical workers. Because virtually all Head Start programs participate in the child care food program, substantial reductions in this program will also increase Head Start operating expenses.

The Reagan administration is now considering changes in Head Start policies that would undermine the program from within. Regulatory and policy changes under consideration by the Office of Human Development Services include:

Eliminating or reducing funding for health and social services provided under the Head Start program;

Substantially reducing the number of grantees;

Limiting the program's length to some 4 hours per day, excluding the option of full-day programs;

Closing the program to all but 4- and 5-year-olds; and Limiting the program's yearly operation to 8 months.

These options, particularly eliminating or reducing related health and social services, could spell disaster for this successful program. Head Start has always been known for its comprehensive nature, serving the whole child rather than focusing strictly on children's academic skills. Consolidating the number of grantees would also harm the program. Because Head Start's strength lies in its community-based nature, fewer grantees will likely mean less community and parental involvement.

FOSTER CARE AND ADOPTION

The Department of Health and Human Services estimates that 500,000 children who were being aided by public welfare and social service agencies, are in foster care or in institutions. It was to help these children that Congress overwhelmingly passed Public Law 96-272, the Adoption Assistance and Child Welfare Act of 1980.

Public Law 96-272 was enacted to encourage substantial reforms on behalf of homeless children in this country. During its 5 years of considering the law, Congress heard repeatedly that child welfare systems were failing to adequately protect children in their care. Services to prevent placements and reunify families were not in place; children too often lacked case plans; and cases were not being reviewed periodically. Further, States knew little about the status of children in their care.

Under the new law, as a condition for receiving Federal funds, States must establish service programs, as well as an inventory and information system, and case plans and case reviews. Assistance under this law is provided only for the placement of special needs children who are already receiving Federal welfare assistance such as AFDC or SSI.

Despite administration attempts to have Public Law 96-272 included in the social services block grant last year, the foster care and adoption portions of the law were maintained as entitlements. Funds for the child welfare services component, however, were reduced to $155 million. Nevertheless, Federal regulations for this important new law are still lacking, and further administration attempts to include it in a block grant and reduce its funding have been announced.

CHILDREN AND POVERTY

Our young citizens constitute the poorest segment of our population. According to figures compiled by the children's defense fund, 1 in 6 children is poor in any 1 year. In 1977, while all 11.6 percent of the general population lived in poverty, 16 percent of all children did. And the younger the children, the more likely they are to be poor: 18.4 percent of all those under 3; 17.9 percent of those between 3 and 5; and 16 percent of those 6 to 13. One child in eight had their parents either unemployed or not in the labor force; for black children, the figure was 1 in 3.

As debate rages over how to make the Nation's public welfare system more equitable, efficient, and responsive to human needs, little is heard regarding the impact of welfare policies on children—the poorest age group in the population and the reason for the largest welfare program in the country, AFDC (Aid to Families with Dependent Children).

AFDC

Children 18 years of age and under account for over two-thirds of all those receiving AFDC. Each year, one out of every nine children in this country depends upon welfare funds for survival.

Despite impressions to the contrary, AFDC does not support employable adults. Only 1 percent of AFDC recipients are adult males—fathers who are either incapacitated or unemployed and job hunting. Nineteen percent are mothers. Of these women, 4 out of 10 are caring for very young children; 1 in 10 is handicapped; 3 of 10 are in the labor force or in training, and 2 of 10 are actually available for work. Nevertheless, of this last group, more than half are either over 40, or have had no work experience, or both.

Welfare benefits from AFDC do not make people rich. AFDC payments for a family of four ranged from $120 per month in Mississippi to $569 in Oregon during 1980.

The AFDC program, funded at $8.5 billion in fiscal year 1981, was cut by $1.2 billion for fiscal year 1982 and by a total of $4 billion between 1982 and 1984. It is estimated that more than 800,000 in 3.6 million families receiving benefits will be cut from the rolls nationally, and that another 260,000 families will see their benefits reduced. The major revisions in the AFDC law include:

Excluding from the program families with property—excluding a home and one car—whose value exceeds $1,000;

Excluding families with gross earnings over 150 percent of each State's "needs standards"; and Discontinuing incentives to work which allowed the first $30 and one-third plus one-third of what a working parent earned to be disregarded when calculating AFDC eligibility.

The exclusion from AFDC of all families with gross earnings over 150 percent of a State's needs standard will drive many families deeper into poverty, first because some needs standards are set very low and second, because families with high medical bills or other expenses have disposable incomes well below their gross earnings. Another critical factor that intensifies the impact of AFDC cuts is that elimination of AFDC benefits also terminates medicaid benefits. For many working mothers, the elimination of medicaid benefits will be more critical in determining whether she can afford to continue working than dollar reductions in her AFDC grant. How will the children of these working-poor receive medical care? Because other program cuts are likely to reduce public health programs such as free inoculations, and because special nutrition programs are also being reduced, we may see a resurgence of childhood diseases related to poverty and malnutrition in the years ahead.

FOOD STAMPS

The food stamp program, designed to increase the food purchasing power of low-income households to a point where they could buy a nutritionally adequate low-cost diet, has gradually replaced the food distribution program which had offered benefits in the form of surplus and price-support commodities since the Depression. Approximately 55 percent of the 22 million Americans who depend on food stamps to feed themselves are children. The average food stamp allotment totals about 40 cents per meal.

The $1.7 billion cut in the food stamp program for fiscal year 1982 will result in approximately 1 million people currently receiving food stamps to be denied eligibility, and benefit reductions for almost all of the remaining 21 million recipients.

Because food stamp allotments are based on Federal, and not State, definitions of poverty, they have served to make more equivalent State welfare benefits. The President's recent proposal to turn this program over to the States threatens to return the Nation's welfare system to its previous State of vast inequity.

Despite individual exceptions and myths to the contrary, surveys by the U.S. Department of Agriculture and the Bureau of Labor Statistics document that food stamp recipients spend a smaller percentage of their food dollar on sweets and snack foods than nonfood stamp shoppers. Similarly, food-stamp households spend only 12.2 percent of their weekly food expenditures on beef and veal, whereas nonfood stamp households spend 15.4 percent for red meat products.

In a program as large as the food stamp program, some fraud and abuse are bound to occur. They can be combatted, however, without dismantling a program that has provided millions of American children with diets more nutritious than those they would have been otherwise served. Indeed, the diets of low-income children have shown marked improvement over the past 15 years. The results of the nationwide food consumption survey, conducted in 1965 and again in 1977 showed that the iron intake of infants actually doubled during this span of time.

HOUSING

Children deserve to live in adequate and safe housing. Poor housing can and does result in illness, injury, or even death for youngsters. Buildings, whose peeling lead-based paint is ingested by young children, house thousands of urban families and condemn many of their offspring to lifetimes of mental retardation or behavioral disturbance.

Families with young children from all segments of society experience difficulty finding adequate rental housing. Exclusionary rental policies, which limit the options of families with children in their search for housing, have become increasingly prevalent in recent years in areas that do not have local ordinances prohibiting such discrimination. These discriminatory policies affect families that are large and small, middle class and poor, white as well as black and Hispanic. Families with children represent about one-third of the rental market nationwide. They want decent, safe, and sanitary housing, yet often they must settle for substandard housing in areas that are less than desirable.

The administration plans to replace Federal housing programs that expand the supply of safe and decent low-income housing with a system of vouchers that will be given directly to families for the rental of housing. The current recession, however, has substantially reduced the production of rental housing. Of what use will vouchers be if housing that meets the required minimum standards is simply unavailable to large families?

HEALTH CARE

Although children's health has improved markedly since the time of the New Deal, when Federal funds were first provided to State health departments for the improvement of the health of mothers and young children, much remains to be done. The children's defense fund reports that 1 out of 7 American children under 17—almost 10 million—has no regular source of primary health care and that 1 out of 3—more than 18 million—has not seen a dentist. Ours is one of few industrialized nations that does not have a system of maternal and child health centers where all young children and pregnant women, regardless of income, can receive regular preventive and medical services. Yet, despite the inadequacy of our efforts to promote children's health, this administration is attempting to cut them back even further.

BLOCK GRANTS

Last year, 19 different health programs were folded into 4 health block grants and had their funding reduced by about one-fourth. Many of these programs provide critical health services to this Nation's children.

The program to prevent and screen for lead poisoning, for example, was folded into the maternal and child health block grant. Four percent of all American children, 12 percent of black children, and 19 percent of black low-income children have moderately high blood lead levels. High blood lead levels have been linked to children's learning and behavioral problems such as reduced IQ, hyperactivity, shortened attention span, headaches, and irritability.

Children's Hospital of Washington, D.C., reports that whereas 32 percent of children screened exhibited high levels of lead toxicity before the program's institution, only 1.4 percent did in 1981.

The comprehensive lead-based paint poisoning prevention program will likely be cut back further or discontinued as States struggle to meet other critical health needs.

MEDICAID

Half of all medicaid recipients are children. Nevertheless, their number sought to be greater. Although participation in the AFDC program entitles families to have their medical care paid for by medicaid, many AFDC recipients are unaware that they are entitled to this coverage. The black pulse survey conducted by the National Urban League found that of low-income black families receiving AFDC, half did not know they had medicaid coverage.

Medicaid reaches an extemely improverished population—elderly, blind, and disabled persons, and mothers with dependent children who do not have the support of a spouse. The degree of impoverishment required to qualify a family for medicaid is illustrated by the fact that for a family of four, the maximum allowable annual income for medicaid recipients is $5,172 in New York, $3,444 in Delaware, and only $1,680 in Texas.

EPSDT (the early and periodic screening, diagnosis, and treatment program) is the children's component of medicaid. The services provided by this program are those that other children receive from their private pediatricians—outpatient preventive health services. The services, which are mandatory and must be provided if a family requests them, are most often provided by agencies that receive Federal assistance, such as public health clinics and Head Start centers.

EPSDT screenings cost about $20 per child. Yet, this small expenditure has been shown by a health care financing agency study to save from two to five times that amount over just the 2 years following the screening, with lifetime savings being many times higher. Screening and identifying just one Head Start child with goiter, which results in mental retardation, can save up to $4 million over the lifetime of that child in institutionalization costs.

If many AFDC families are unaware of their eligibility for medicaid, even fewer know about the EPSDT program for their children. It is estimated that only 30 percent of all medical screenings of children that might have been done, were actually carried out. Even though only one-sixth of our poorest children are actually receiving EPSDT services, an estimated 40 percent of their detected problems go untreated. Remediable problems detected in screenings may go untreated because State medicaid regulations do not cover the prescribed treatment. Eyeglasses, for example, are not reimbursable by medicaid in many States.

Until further information is provided by the administration, we cannot know how EPSDT will fare under the President's proposed plan for the Federal Government to take over all of medicaid. Will it provide the desperately needed outreach to eligible families, or require them to pay some portion of the cost of their care? The health of millions of children will be determined by the outcome of these decisions.

ADOLESCENTS

Society holds parents responsible for the care of their children up until their 18th birthday. Many families continue to support children well beyond this cutoff point—others depend on their teenagers to supplement the family budget. Few families do not experience some dislocation as their children pass through these sometimes tumultous years, whether it be the added financial strain of supporting children in college, the unanticipated pregnancy of a teenaged daughter, or a young man or woman unable to work because of outrageously high levels of youth unemployment.

STUDENT AID

The American Council on Education estimates that of the 10 million full-time college students in this Nation, 5 to 6 million depend on some kind of federally funded student financial aid to defray the costs of their education.

Some $200 million was slashed from need-based programs for fiscal year 1981, and another $200 million in fiscal year 1982. Changes in the guaranteed student loan program include instituting a needs test for families with incomes of $30,000 or less, and placing a 5-percent origination fee on each new loan. Interest rates on parent loans were boosted from 9 percent to 14 percent.

The administration is expected to send to Congress on February 8 proposed new cutbacks in the Federal programs aimed at helping students pay for college educations. It is expected that the new cuts would reduce student aid funding 49 percent below 1981 levels. It has been estimated by the American Council on Education that cuts of this magnitude will remove more than 1 million students from the Pell grant program, aid targeted to the neediest students, and eliminate another 1.3 million awards under campus-based assistance programs. Most students from families with annual incomes between $14,000 and $27,000 would no longer be able to participate in these programs.

Another source of support for university students will soon disappear. Social security education benefits, now going to 750,000 students and totaling $2 billion annually—one-fifth of all U.S. student aid—will be phased out by 1985. This May is the cutoff date for new recipients to claim social security education benefits, while those now receiving benefits will experience a 25-percent aid cut each year.

TEEN-AGE PREGNANCY

Whether adults approve or not, approximately 12 million of this Nation's 29 million teenagers are sexually active. In 1978, over 360,000 infants were born to girls between 12 and 17 years of age, over 23,000 of them to girls under 14.

The birth of a child to a teenage mother often institutes a cycle of family social dependency. Not only are prematurity, low-birth weight, and ill health more likely to occur among babies of teenage mothers, but women who give birth in their teens earn approximately one-half of what women do who give birth in their twenties, are more likely to abuse their children, and are almost certain to drop out of school.

Congress has addressed the teenage pregnancy problem through title X of the Public Health Service Act, with additional funding coming from titles V, XIX, and XX of the Social Security Act. Nearly 1.5 sexually active teenagers attended family planning clinics in 1979—one-third of all sexually active teenagers in need of family planning services. Contraceptive use by sexually active teenagers increased 35 percent over the past decade. Before clinic enrollment, 8 of 10 teenagers used one of the least effective contraceptive methods or none at all, while after enrollment 71 percent used one of the most effective methods. The Alan Gullmacher Institute reports that the $63 per patient cost for family planning services in 1979 produced savings for taxpayers of an estimated $2.90 for every dollar spent.

One of the main reasons teenagers delay or fail to seek medical contraception is their fear that parents might find out that they are sexually active. Clinics that do not require parental consent or notification serve relatively more teenagers than those with more restrictive policies. Despite this well-known phenomenon, the administration has proposed that family planning agencies receiving Federal funds notify the parents of clients under 18 who seek contraceptive assistance. Notification would be required within 10 days after the services are provided. In addition, state laws that are more restrictive would take precedence. This action on the part of the Secretary of Health and Human Services violates the intent of Congress which, in a House-Senate conference report, stated that "family involvement is not mandated," violates the civil rights of this Nation's teenagers, and threatens to reverse the recent downward trend in teenage pregnancy.

YOUTH UNEMPLOYMENT

Average annual unemployment among youth workers—those in the 16- to 19-year-age bracket—was 21.7 percent in December 1981, with the rate for minority teenagers at 39.6 percent.

Federal initiatives to address the problem of youth unemployment include title IV-A of CETA (youth training), title IV-B (Job Corps), title IV-C (summer youth) and title VIII (Young Adult Conservation Corps). Although title IV-B has essentially been maintained at the same level of funding as that provided in the fiscal year 1981 continuing resolution under which it was funded, title IV-A has been reduced from $875 million to $192 million—a reduction of 78 percent—title IV-C from $839 to $640 million.—a 24 percent reduction—and title VIII has been eliminated altogether.

Youth unemployment results in lost opportunities for personal development, decreased national productivity, and social disruption. Ignoring the problem will not cause it to disappear.

THE MISTREATMENT OF CHILDREN

Unfortunately, families are not always the havens we might like them to be. The stresses of mental illness, unemployment, or marital strife can result in parents behaving toward children in ways that are inappropriate, harmful, and sometimes even dangerous.

PARENTAL KIDNAPPING

Some parents, distraught over divorce and custody decrees resort to kidnapping their children from the custodial parent. The Parental Kidnapping Prevention Act (Public Law 96-611), designed to enlist the FBI in helping track down mothers and fathers who abduct their children, requires States to honor child custody decrees of other States, authorizes the Federal Parent Locator Service of the Department of Health and Human Services to help locate abducting parents and missing children, and directed the Justice Department to use the Fugitive Felon Act in parental child-snatching cases. That act allows the FBI to help State officials locate fugitives. Enforcement efforts of the Justice Department, which has traditionally avoided getting involved in domestic relations disputes, has been disappointing. The injury and, in some cases, deaths of children kidnapped by their own parent illustrates dramatically the problem of how to balance effectively the protection of children's rights with those of the family to freedom from intrusion by the Government.

CHILD ABUSE

Child abuse is not a new phenonmenon. Children have been physically traumatized, deprived of the necessities of life, and molested sexually since the dawn of human history. What is new is that its existence has been formally identified and publicized. The delay in its recognition as a social problem is due, in part, to the fact that the idea that parents, who are supposed to love and protect their offspring, could be responsible for their child's physical injury or even death is so repulsive that many refuse to believe it. Furthermore, our close association with English common law, which gives fathers virtually absolute custody and control of their children, has resulted in our Government's reluctance to intrude in family affairs.

Although increased reporting of child abuse over the last 15 years was encouraged through the enactment of State laws that require the reporting of suspected cases of child abuse and also provide immunity from civil law suits, the actual incidence of child abuse and neglect is difficult to ascertain. The most recent analysis, the National Analysis of Official Child Neglect and Abuse Reporting, 1978, done by the Department of Health and Human Services, reports that there were 615,000 cases of child abuse and/or neglect reported in 1978, an increase of 100,000 over the previous year. The National Center on Child Abuse and Neglect, however, estimates that 1 million children are maltreated each year. Records indicate that most of the severely injured children are under the age of 3 and that the heaviest concentration of fatalities occurs in the newborn-to-1 age group. Adolescents, however, are also physically abused by their parents. The national network estimates that approximately 15 percent of adolescents receiving services at their shelters show some evidence of physical abuse.

In January 1974 the Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment Act (Public Law 93-247) was enacted to provide Federal financial assistance for the identification, prevention, and treatment of child abuse and neglect. The legislation, amended by Public Law 95-266 in April 1978, establishes a program of State grants to provide services for the prevention and treatment of child abuse and neglect such as interdisciplinary teams of professionals to assist abusive families, assistance to parental self-help groups, and crisis centers and hotlines. Recipients of services are abused children and their families without regard to income. There is no State matching requirement. It also establishes a program of grants for research and demonstration projects. These grants are 100 percent federally funded. This category also included funds for the administration of the National Center on Child Abuse and Neglect in DHHS, which administers both the program of State grants and that for research and demonstration.

Although the administration requested a total of only $8 million for the programs authorized under this act, House and Senate appropriations levels were considerably higher. The continuing resolution, under which these programs presently operate, provides $16.5 million, a little more than half of what the CBO estimated the programs would need to maintain services at 1981 levels—$29 million.

DOCUMENTATION OF POLICY EFFECTS

The Government's 36 statistical agencies, which gather and disseminate national data on various topics, have felt the budget-cutter's axe as have other nondefense agencies. As major changes and reductions in programs that serve children are occurring, the wherewithal to monitor their effects is also being removed. The Bureau of Labor Statistics and the Census Bureau had their funds reduced 12 percent and 16 percent respectively between 1981 and 1982. These two agencies monitor the status of families through the current population survey and its special March supplements which document, for example, the number of women in the work force, the age and numbers of their children, and the type of family they comprise; that is, traditional, single-parent, and so forth. It was this survey that documented the profound structural changes occurring in the American family and demonstrated that, today, only 6 to 7 percent of all families correspond to the classic traditional structure of employed father, homemaker mother, and two children.

One result of administration budget reductions will be the inability of the Bureau of Labor Statistics to double the current 60,000 family sample of the current population survey as recommended by the Carter-era National Commission on Employment and Unemployment Statistics. In fact, budget reductions will probably require decreasing the sample by 12,000 families. Increased sample size is essential if we are to refine our knowledge about what is happening in minority families. We cannot afford to be ostriches and assume that children and their families are not being hurt by Government policy just because the documentation of these effects has been made impossible by withholding funds from our statistical agencies.

Recommendations that States take over the collection of statistics threaten the excellence of Federal efforts. Data across States will likely not be comparable. Indeed, the task of coordinating data collection by 50 independent agencies may well be impossible.

The need in the days ahead is for more data, not less. If public policy is to be intelligent and not based on gut reactions or ideology, we must have comprehensive statistical data bases to run our $3 trillion economy

Mr. COLLINS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEISS. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. COLLINS of Texas. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I have been interested in listening to the gentleman as he talked about all of the cuts that President Reagan has suggested, and as the gentleman knows, we are going to run over a $100 billion deficit this year and the President is trying to take some constructive stand in balancing the budget.

What does the gentleman suggest?

Mr. WEISS. I am pleased that the gentleman has been in fact listening carefully.

What I suggest is that which has been suggested by many others. First, that instead of taking some of the additional cuts out of the hides of children and old people, those who can least afford it, that we try to recapture some of the tremendous tax giveaways that this Congress, at the urging of the President, engaged in last year to the benefit of big business, the large corporations, and the wealthiest in America's society; that we cut back on military expenditures, which again on the basis of just everybody's analysis, from Dave Stockman on down, is running rampantly wild; that we try in every way that we can to put America's unemployed back to work, because for every 1-percent increase in the unemployment level there is a drain on the U.S. Treasury of somewhere between $25 billion and $30 billion.

You can probably account for about $50 billion of the current deficit simply on the basis of increased unemployment since the President has come to office. I think that if we start doing some of the constructive things rather than hurting those who can least protect themselves, then perhaps we can have, not a perfect society, but certainly a better society than the one toward which the administation is taking us.

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEISS. I would be happy to yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the gentleman from New York (Mr. WEISS) for taking this special order to talk about the impact of the Federal budget and the budget cuts on children in this country.

President Reagan was right when he spoke the other night and said that "millions of Americans harbor the simple wish for a safe and financially secure future for their children," but in fact, the President is deceiving the American people into thinking that his policies will achieve such ends.

The administration would have us dismantle programs and policies for children and families that took 30 years to develop, but on the basis of what evidence would he have us dismantle those programs?

The administration argued that dismantling these programs will save money, but all our evidence from the WIC program for low-income pregnant women and their infants, all the evidence from the fledgling foster care reform program, all of the evidence from the 17-year-old title I program for educationally disadvantaged children, shows just the opposite.

Without these programs of prevention, the long-term costs to the American taxpayer would have been far greater.

The administration argues on the basis of a few anecdotal cases that dramatic funding cuts for these programs will eliminate waste, fraud, and abuse. If the administration's real concern is with the waste, fraud, and abuse, why is there no administration effort to go after waste, fraud, and abuse in the defense budget?

Just this week it was reported that Paul Thayer, who is chairman of LTV, a major defense contractor, told the President, "that I have been in defense contracting for over 30 years and I can tell you that 40 percent of the cost of planes I sell is attributable to redtape, bureaucracy, and duplicative expenditures."

Forty percent. Is there a person in this Congress who has been hearing lately of 40 percent of social program expenditures that are a result of redtape, bureaucracy, and duplicative expenditures? I do not believe so. That has never been alleged in this Congress and yet those are the programs that have received the heaviest cuts, while the heaviest increases have gone to the Pentagon.

In fact, there has been a careful refinement of those social programs by the Congress over the past years, which has eliminated untargeted use of funds and abuses by program operators.

Even in the falsely discredited food stamp program, which we tend to forget has been the single most important force in eradicating hunger and malnutrition in this country, even in this program, USDA's own figures show that fully 95 percent of the food stamp recipients are in fact eligible recipients.

The administration also argues that the drastic cuts in social programs are the only hope for balancing the budget. But this is patently false as the OMB Director Stockman so convincingly revealed last year in his interview with the Atlantic Monthly.

President Reagan is not willing to renege on his commitment to the wealthy individuals and corporations, even by closing the huge tax loopholes or by eliminating special interest favors. But the President and his advisers apparently have no qualms about breaking decades of commitments to our most valuable and vulnerable Americans, children and low-income families.

It is time to set the record straight. The programs this Congress created over the past several decades are working, they are saving money, they are helping children to become productive citizens.

We did not develop these programs in the first place simply because the Congress had nothing to do one day. Each of these programs was developed in response to some clearly identified need on the basis of extensive investigations and hearings by the Congress, and as a result of testimony from State and local officials who asked for our guidance and our assistance. We made the commitment to those States, localities, and school districts, as well as to the children and the parents they serve. They depend on that commitment.

On the basis of what evidence would we now throw away 30 years of work in these longstanding programs?

On the basis of what evidence would we now dismantle a program that brought this country from the depths of the Depression to being the richest, the freest, the strongest, the most able country in the history of the world?

As we are being asked to dismantle these programs, let me ask a simple question:

What is it that we are apologizing for? Are we going to apologize for having the most successful education system in the entire world? For having more young people enrolled in college than any other country, for having greater literacy than any other country? Are we going to apologize for traveling over the best transportation system of any country in the world, for cutting down the cost of bringing our goods and services to market?

□ 1330

Are we going to apologize for having the best harbors, and networks for the best inland and boat ways of any place in the world?

Are we going to apologize to the millions of Americans who had their homes financed by FHA, by the veterans programs?

Are we going to apologize for the Government providing mortgage assistance and other programs for millions of Americans?

Are we going to apologize for the fact that even today the Government is spending millions of dollars to keep the savings and loans institutions from going broke? Thirty years ago there would have been a panic if this many savings and loans were on the poor list, if this many savings and loans had to merge; but it is the Federal Government that is picking up the pieces to the tune of millions of dollars in just the last few months because of bad management.

Are we going to apologize because the Federal Government assisted tens of thousands of farmers across this country, that created the most productive agricultural system in the world that not only feeds everyone in this country at lowest cost, but feeds a good portion of the rest of the world and provides vital foodstuffs for those people?

On what evidence is one man who comes into office, who weekly demonstrates his lack of knowledge of the workings of these programs and others, on what evidence is this one man asking us to turn back the clock, to go where we were 20 years ago, to dismantle the Federal Government, a Federal Government that has served the people of this country well, that has provided nutrition, that has provided health care for the elderly, for the poor, education for our children.

Who is going to educate the next generation of children?

Who is going to provide health care to the next generation of the elderly?

Who is going to finance the next generation of housing?

The President would have us believe that charity and the private sector would. They never have in the past and I do not know why they would start now. There is no indication, in fact, that they plan to.

I think that as we consider the impact of last year's budget cuts and as this Congress engages in another round of budget cuts, we had better understand the multiple impacts that these cuts start to build on our Nation's children, as we start to cut title XX which provides help for foster grandparents programs and for children, as we start to cut the education programs. As the gentleman who sits with me on the Education and Labor Committee knows, we sat through several hours of hearings this morning with local representatives of the National School Boards Association, and not one of them could tell our committee how education is better today for this Nation's children than it was a year ago. Not one of them could provide an example of how we are better serving the children of this country then we were a year ago. The question this Congress must face, and hopefully can be addressed not only in this special order, but can be addressed throughout the rest of this year, is "Where is the evidence?" Who can say that life is better for those children than it was a year ago?

Let me remind you that none of those children yet have been proven to be fraudulent, have been proven to be wasteful, have been proven to abuse the programs that this Congress and this country designed to help them.

I think before we go any further, this administration has an obligation to the people of this country to show them the evidence—not the hope, not the desire, not the promises, but the hard evidence about how their program will treat children better this year than it did last year and next year better than it did this year, because there is no evidence to suggest that that will take place.

Again I want to thank the gentleman from New York (Mr. WEISS) who has been deeply involved in trying to provide for those who are less fortunate than the rest of us and who has provided tremendous leadership in this Congress on children's issues. Every Fourth of July the politicians of our country stand up and say "children are our most important resource, the future of our country"; "if we do not provide for these children, the country will not exist in the future"; "if we ignore these resources, we will truly be poor".

I guess they figure on the Fourth of July the children are all of a sudden not paying attention, because the rest of the year these politicians slash the budgets. They ignore the children who cannot vote and so are not listened to. But on the Fourth of July they look at a child waving the flag and they tell that child, "You, my dear, are our world's most important resource. You are the future of our country." And then when they come back to Washington, they ignore it. They ignore it time and again, and there is no safety net. In spite of the President's rhetoric, there is no safety net at this time for the children of the United States of America.

Mrs. FENWICK. Mr. Speaker, will my colleague yield?

Mr. WEISS. I would be pleased to yield to the gentlewoman in one moment.

I want to commend our colleague, the gentleman from California, for his very moving and eloquent statement. It is, I think, quite clear that unless this Congress stands up, we may be furthering a process of destroying our own children.

I would be pleased to yield to the gentlewoman from New Jersey.

Mrs. FENWICK, I thank my colleague for yielding.

Not all politicians speak in such cliches. I think that this is well to remind this Congress. I think there are many of us who stand before the children of this Nation and tell them honestly what has happened, that we are handing them a country heavy in debt, crippled with deficits and debt service such as we have never known.

I think we all stand before the children of this Nation and say to them, "We are going to try to guarantee you the opportunities that you ought to have. We are not going to try to guaranteee you what you had in these past few years. We are going to guarantee you something far better, a Nation that works, a Nation with jobs for your parents and for you when you come to employment time." That is what I hope we are going to guarantee them, not what we have seen in these past years, not what we have seen, but something better; a vision of America, which is what their parents knew and that is what we are going to have, with some opportunity for the children who want to work and who have the ability to do that work.

We have got to make sure that they have the opportunity to learn it; but it is not going to be done the way we have been doing it. I think we ought to make that clear. Every single generation has been told. "You are the hope of the future." We were, too, and look where we are now.

Year after year, wars and more wars and spending and more spending and deficits and bigger deficits, and that is not good enough. We are going to have to give them a new vision of peace and responsibility and independence and individual rights. That is what we have to do.

I thank the gentleman.

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentlewoman for participating; but I do find it rather strange that we would be putting the burden and the onus on the backs of children themselves, when we have an infant mortality rate in this country that is so high that it is not even among the top 10 nations of the world, and where we have 70 percent of AFDC recipients being children.

I think that it is not enough to just talk the game. That is what the gentleman from California was saying. You cannot just talk it. What you have to do is to vote the game.

The people of this country, and not just the children, but adults as well, will be looking to see where the people who talk about the great visions are when it comes to voting for the realities of the day.

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEISS. I would be pleased to yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. MILLER of California. I would just like to say that the statement of the gentlewoman from New Jersey is exactly what I was talking about. You offer all of the fine rhetoric about the vision for children, but when you vote to cut off supplemental food for a pregnant woman who is at high nutritional risk and who runs a much greater chance of having a deformed child, a retarded child, that child is not going to get a vision of the world. What that child needs at that moment is high protein food.

Your rhetoric, your commitment, is of little value when the food is not there. That is exactly what we are talking about. We will get on with the vision of peace, but let us first bring healthy children into the world.

Mrs. FENWICK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEISS. I would be pleased to yield to the gentlewoman.

Mrs. FENWICK. I presume we are talking about the WIC program, women and infant children; right?

I would like to see this Congress do what it knows it ought to do. All these programs, food stamps and everything else, food stamps ought to come out of agriculture. Why can we not get it out of agriculture? Because the Congress of the United States will not let it go.

What do we say to the women on WIC?

Now, let me just tell you about what happened to a woman in my district. The child can be taken care of for 5 years, the woman for only 1 year. So what happens? The child is 1 year old. She still has problems and the child can be taken care of by the WIC program for 5 years, but she is only eligible for 1, pregnancy and 1, but the child 5. It does not make sense.

Mr. MILLER of California. If you keep voting to cut these funds, nobody will be eligible.

Mrs. FENWICK. If we are going to make funds for the people, we ought to put all the programs together, the food stamps and the WIC program and make them all come together in one program so that people get proper food. The administrative costs are ridiculous. I do not know when we are going to make sense in this Congress.

Mr. WEISS. I must say that I find it difficult to follow the argument of the gentlewoman from New Jersey. I know that she means very well.

The fact is that the WIC program has only reached about 30 percent of the women and children who would qualify for it. In the time that it has been in existence, some 10 years, there is no question that its positive effects have been substantiated. It has done a major job in reducing early deaths to babies.

Mrs. FENWICK. Put it together.

Mr. WEISS. If the gentlewoman will permit, it is my time.

It has prevented malnutrition by the tens and tens of thousands. And here comes the President. All you have to do is read today's Washington Post. The President, having failed last year to intimidate the Congress into cutting that particular program, now wants to take 25 percent out of the WIC program.

Again last year, we saw the spectacle of this House presented with a bill which nobody had seen, 800 pages long, rolled into one, covering hundreds of programs, I did not hear the gentlewoman at that time object. Nay, she voted for that and for all the cuts that were involved in that program and that, I think, is what we mean when we say one cannot just talk the game. You have to be present when the votes are taken and you have got to vote for the kids then, because it does not do them very much good afterward to say, "Oh, we have got to have a new vision."

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEISS. I would be pleased to yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. MILLER of California. I would just like to say for the record that it is so incredibly clear by studies that were done, not by the Federal Government, but by studies that were done by Harvard University and Yale University.

Two factors: One, for those participants who participated in the program, infant mortality was cut in half. That figure alone ought to justify the program; but for those who are concerned about the budget, let me say that the other study also showed that for every dollar we spend on WIC participants, we saved $3 in later hospital costs because those children were not born premature, they were not born at low birth weights, they were not born retarded, they were not born deformed; so in fact, for every dollar, we got back $3 just in short-term hospital cost savings.

I find it also incredible that the gentlewoman who voted against the program, would now bring up program administration, when WIC has one of the lowest administrative costs of any of the programs.

So I am not eager to lump WIC in with a lot of other programs. This program can stand on its own. It has brought thousands and thousands of healthy babies into the world. It has saved us millions and millions of dollars. It has a low administrative cost, and yet every Member on the Republican side of the aisle, except one, I think, voted against this program.

Now the President is sending us additional cuts. It is not just this program. The gentlewoman also voted against title I programs when supporting those cuts. Let me say that the children who participate in title I read better, they retain their ability to read longer, they compute better, they retain their ability to compute longer. In fact, they start doing well in our educational system.

The rhetoric is that we want to break the welfare cycle. So here is a program that allows young people from disadvantaged homes to read better, to compute mathematics better, to do better in school, and we are cutting it off.

This morning the Education and Labor Committee was told that thousands and thousands of poor children are not going to be allowed to participate in this program. So I think what we see here is a gentle protest from somebody who voted to cut all these programs and now we find out, as we unfortunately did, that the unemployment offices are closed when unemployment is the highest, that we threw a lot of people off social security with that vote, that you cut the title I program, all of these inadvertent mistakes.

I suggest they are not inadvertent, because they are proposed by people who seek to dismantle the Federal Government.

The fact of the matter is, as the gentleman is pointing out in this special order, these cuts fall so terribly hard on the children who cannot fight back, who do not have advocates in the Congress.

I want to thank the gentleman again for setting the record straight, that those who vote against children cannot talk out of the other side of their mouth and say that they are for children. There is a moment of truth. We had it last year on reconciliation. We had it on the budget and we had it in the December cuts and the moment of truth for the American people will be all during this year as this Congress is going to be measured by its vote and not by its rhetoric.

Mrs. FENWICK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEISS. I would be pleased to yield.

Mrs. FENWICK. The Head Start is not going to be cut and is separate from other bills.

Mr. MILLER of California. The gentlewoman knows all the additional services that support Head Start are being cut. You voted for them.

Mrs. FENWICK. I voted for Head Start. I intend to continue.

Mr. WEISS. The Reagan administration is now considering changes in Head Start policies that would undermine that program from within.

I wish the gentlewoman from New Jersey would listen to this.

Regulatory and policy changes under consideration by the Office of Human Services include the following: Eliminating or reducing funding for health and social services provided under the Head Start program; substantially reducing the number of grantees under the Head Start program; limiting the Head Start program's length to some 4 hours per day; excluding the option of full-day programs; closing the program to all but 4 and 5 year olds; limiting the program's yearly operation to 8 months.

Those options which the administration wants to impose now, particularly eliminating or reducing related health and social services, could spell disaster for this very successful program. Head Start has always been known for its comprehensive nature, serving the whole child rather than focusing strictly on children's academic skills.

Now, the fact is that the Reagan administration wants to destroy that concept, and the terrible tragedy is that Members of this body do not know it, do not follow it closely enough, and too often vote blindly because they believe that the President would not do anything to harm children. Well, that is what the President said, but it is not what the President does. And the people who sent us here have a right to expect when it comes to those votes which cut benefits and services, survival programs for people young and old alike, that at least we know what we are voting on and do not pretend that all is well because the President says he will not hurt children or old people or anybody else.

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEISS. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. MILLER of California. I want to thank the gentleman for making that point.

The President did not say he would not hurt children. He said he would not cut Head Start. In fact, he did cut Head Start. More importantly, for those holding onto Head Start as their one vote for the children of America, they better understand Head Start is a composite program. It receives help from title XX. It receives help from CETA. These were services provided to these children, a terribly successful and important program for the future of these children's education. Those services have all been cut.

So it is not enough. The Head Start balloon alone will not hold up the Republican Party as they continue to vote against children, as they have each and every time we have had a resolution up here on the floor of the Congress. And it is not going to be enough for this President, because even the fondest supporters, the strongest supporters of Head Start, now understand the sham of his argument that he holds out to America, "I will not cut Head Start," and somehow he is pro-child. It is just not the case, because he has cut everything else that is involved with Head Start, and even the actual funding for Head Start was cut under his direction.

Again, I thank the gentleman for bringing that to the attention of the Congress.

Mr. WEISS. I thank the gentleman.

It is very important to understand that these programs are all interrelated. The CETA program in 1981 was cut to the extent of eliminating 6,000 Head Start workers who had served as teachers, aides, bus drivers, and clerical workers, and because virtually all of the Head Start programs participate in the child care food program, substantial reductions in that program will also increase Head Start's operating expenses.

So you really have to look at the whole panoply of cuts that are involved, because they all ultimately affect one another.

One does not want to get partisan in this kind of discussion, and yet obviously by the very nature of things one must. Although up to this point I have been saying, do not just listen to what people say, look to see how they have voted. I am now going to point out a guide.

Last year there were three major votes taken which set the framework for the budget and for the deficits. The first vote was that on the first budget resolution which set the guideline for $37 billion in cuts in social programs. On that vote, not a single Member of this body who is not of the Democratic Party, not a single Republican, broke ranks with the Reagan administration. They voted down the line to the last Member, liberal, conservative, reactionary, urban, rural, suburban. Every Republican voted for those cuts.

On the Omnibus Reconciliation Act, the 800-page bill that nobody had seen until there was a vote, there were two Republicans who broke on that vote. One was the gentlewoman from Rhode Island, and the other was the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. DOUGHERTY).

The tax program, which really cut away three-quarters of a trillion dollars, $750 billion, resulted in these huge deficits. And now the blame is on the children, on the old. They are causing the deficits all of a sudden. On that tax program, there was exactly one Republican who broke ranks with the Reagan administration, the gentleman from Vermont (Mr. JEFFORDS).

As I travel around my district in the city of New York, in the State, everywhere, I hear Republicans trying to cover up their tracks as to how they voted, and I think that we have to make sure that this year there is no coverup, that people know how their Representatives are voting. It is the only way that we can instill any kind of responsibility or accountability to the people who are suffering because of the ravages of the cuts that were imposed last year, and because of that impossible tax cut that was imposed and given as a gift to the largest corporations and to the wealthiest of American society.

● Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Speaker, 7½ years ago we passed the Congressional Budget and Impoundment Control Act of 1974 with the hope that it would not only make our budget more prudent and efficient, but would also provide a mechanism for redirecting our priorities from the bloated military sector to the social welfare programs which alleviate, rather than aggravate, human misery. We had recently suffered through a long and horrible era of violence in which 50,000 of our young people had died in an insane and immoral war in Indochina, while our domestic economy nearly collapsed under the strain of the military budget.

I take this opportunity to remind my colleagues that the Budget Reform Act was designed not only to make our Government's finances more efficient. It was also our response to the promotion of the Pentagon's budget at the expense of human well-being; it was our response to Congress failure to stand up against a corrupt and immoral administration; and it was, above all, our attempt to see beyond the next election, beyond the next weapons system, and to start building a moral and peaceful world for our children and our grandchildren.

I come before you today to protest the manner in which we have abdicated our responsibilities and turned our backs on the very people who should have benefited from the reformed budget process. The congressional budget debates for fiscal year 1982 were simply appalling. First of all, the piece of legislation which was designed to end half a century of total budgetary dominance by the executive branch has been turned 180 degrees. Under the most recent interpretation of the reconciliation process, the congressional budget has become a tool of the Office of Management and Budget. Rather than strengthen the Congress in its dealings with the President, the process has been abused by the Reagan administration to the point where we are once again "the sapless branch."

Second, for fiscal year 1982, there was no effort to examine the macroeconomic effects of an accelerated military budget, or the implications of waste, fraud, and abuse in the armed services. Until we address these two issues, it is ludicrous to talk about fiscal conservatism, controlled inflation or a revitalized economy.

Finally, we must understand that the budget, just like the economy at large, is not infinitely flexible. The money that we are pumping into the Pentagon at an ever-faster rate is being directly and blatantly transferred out of our social welfare programs. We are experiencing a reallocation of Government resources to the most affluent sectors of the society and to the military, and away from those deserving of governmental assistance—the elderly, the handicapped, the unemployed and the poor. But perhaps the most tragic budget cuts are those which affect this Nation's largest unenfranchised constituency—its children.

A truly democratic society treats all of its citizens—young and old—with dignity and respect for their basic human rights. But under the present administration, the lives of young people are secondary to the stockpiling of nuclear weapons. In the next few years, thousands of children will grow up hungry instead of nourished, abused instead of nurtured, ignorant instead of educated, and sick instead of healthy. The interstices of President Reagan's safety net are apparently too wide to keep our children from falling to the depths of misery.

As ignored and mistreated as our children were in fiscal year 1982, they will suffer even more if the administration's proposed 1983 budget cuts, including the abolition of the preventive health care component of medicaid for children, the child care food program, and the Adoption Assistance and Child Welfare Act, are approved by this body. Extreme reductions are also planned in title XX child care, the supplemental feeding program for women, infants and children (WIC), and title I education programs. At the same time, the administration proposes to give aid to families with dependent children (AFDC) and food stamps to the States, despite their apparent inability to support these programs.

In short, there is a concerted effort to destroy the Federal programs which help our children—daycare, education, nutrition, health, AFDC, and medicaid—and to transfer the funds to the military. Children are a politically powerless constituency and to attack them in the name of "fiscal conservatism" is not only cheap and deplorable—it is destructive to the future of our society.

I contend that any cuts in our budget should be made in the Department of Defense and not in those domestic programs which help the less fortunate in our country. Since my election to Congress, my message to my colleagues has been to cut bombs, death, and destruction, and not to threaten the protection of our citizens, turn our backs on the indigent, or stifle the growth of our children. I ask you to join me in fighting for the economic rights of those Americans who are too young to participate in our political system, and to reject any further budget cuts in child-related programs for fiscal 1983.●

● Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, children are among the most vulnerable groups in our society. They are also among the most voiceless. Yet, throughout the history of the American Republic, the Federal Government has reasserted its commitment to our country's children. In 1932, the Democratic platform pledged "a continuous responsibility for human welfare, especially for the protection of children." In 1962, President Kennedy continued this tradition of concern, asking that we "rededicate ourselves to making the life of every child as fruitful and productive as it possibly can be." Today, however, that promise is threatened by an administration that sees human lives in terms of budgetary equations. While it is against American values to expect human sacrifice in the search for an elusive economic solution, that is what we have been asked to do, Yet, to sacrifice the needs of children is to turn back the clock on generations of progress. No matter how appealing the rhetoric of returning programs to State and local governments may be, it is no substitute for a thoughtful analysis of how best to guarantee the right of children to a healthy and productive future.

Over 500,000 children presently live away from their families in facilities ranging from foster family and group homes to large institutions. Some are infants, many more are older children and adolescents, and some have special needs stemming from physical or emotional handicaps. The Department of Health and Human Services estimates that over $4 billion could be saved if the number of children in foster care could be reduced by 30 percent. Yet, the Adoption Assistance and Child Welfare Act of 1980, which holds out hope for such children, is in danger of elimination under the administration's economic program.

One out of every 72 American infants and one in every 47 nonwhite infants dies each year. One in seven American children has no regular source of health care; two out of five are not fully immunized; and one out of three has never been to a dentist. The maternal and child health and crippled children's program (title V of the Social Security Act) provides care to only a fraction of mothers and children who need help and there is a pressing need for expansion of such services. Yet, the Reagan administration favors the abolishment of Title V, and remains insensitive to the urgency of child health care needs.

An overwhelming majority of American families are likely to need day care services in the future. In 1980, there were about 18.9 million American children under six. Forty-three percent of these children had mothers in the labor force. By 1980, there will be an estimated 23.3 million children under six, and over half of these children will have working mothers. Many of these children are neglected because of lack of adequate child care services and wind up in foster homes or institutions. The administration's so-called "profamily" stance cruelly ignores the reality of working women and the need for dependable, high-quality day care that insures the healthy, emotionally secure development of young children.

Children are the poorest of any age group in America. In 1978, while 11.4 percent of the general population lived in poverty, 15.9 percent of all children did. In addition, one in every four children lives in poverty at some time during his or her childhood—lacking even the basic necessities of life. Contrary to popular myth, very few children grow up on welfare. In fact, one-third of all AFDC families go off the welfare rolls each year. The Reagan administration has attacked the AFDC program in the guise of fighting fraud and abuse, capitalizing on what it sees as a general negative perception of public assistance, when what is needed instead is a strengthened system which encourages parents striving to work for a living, and has as its goal the elimination of poverty for the succeeding generation.

Over 1 million school-aged children are not enrolled in school. These children are disproportionately black, Hispanic, Native American, or handicapped. Many are out of school, not by choice, but, because they have been excluded or failed by State and local education systems. Others who are in school are not learning. Education for all handicapped children and the title I program, two successful programs which have responded to the needs of handicapped and educationally disadvantaged children, have been targeted for repeal by the Reagan administration. This would literally wipe out the Federal effort to remedy the problem of exclusion and discrimination in our educational system. If anything, we should build on the significant progress that has been made through emphasizing targeting, parent involvement, and individual rights in order to bring educational opportunity to the country's neediest children.

Children should not be the victims of economic experimentation. If there is any place where we should draw the line against rampant budget cutting, surely it is where the health and well-being of children are concerned.●

● Mrs. COLLINS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, the special order called by our colleague, TED WEISS, comes at a critical time in the future of our greatest living asset: Our children. The Census Bureau, in a report entitled, "Money, Income and Poverty, Status of Families and Persons," found that America's poverty ranks are swelling for the first time in two decades. Calling it one of the largest annual increases in the number of poor since 1959, the Bureau found that the number of children living in poverty leaped from 10.2 million to 11.4 million—almost 1 in 5. The Bureau attributes the setback to high inflation and the economic decline of 1980.

Given these distressing figures, the Reagan administration continues to embark on a path which only serves to bring more misery and hard times to large segments of our population.

When the proposed 1982 budget was released last year, it brought with it a devastating array of cuts in many of the social programs which are the lifeblood of many communities and vital to the survival of poor black and white children. Many of the programs were either drastically reduced in terms of funds and staff, or their allocations were capped, which served only to shut out those with the greatest need. The cuts included a $2.5 billion cut in medicaid, $1 billion cut in AFDC benefits, and the virtual obliteration of the CETA program.

Today's Washington Post features an article based upon a partial draft of the President's fiscal year 1983 budget. The draft budget copy calls for deep cuts in medicaid, food stamps, aid to education, and other federally funded social programs. These cuts, if passed by the Congress would almost totally annihilate many programs before they would be turned over to the States. The President also plans to add four new block grants, one of which would include nutrition programs for women, infants, and children. The child welfare block grant that President Reagan will propose formally to Congress next week would combine foster care programs, adoption assistance, and others at a decrease of some $65 million.

The President knows full well that most State and local governments—particularly those whose citizens are suffering the brunt of the Reagan recession—are already hard pressed to maintain existing minimal services. Revenue sharing will provide neither the requisite financial nor human resources or the will needed to carry out those programs effectively. Even the oil- and gas-rich States that are flush with revenues will resist financing social welfare programs, preferring instead to reduce income taxes.

President Reagan also seems to have very little historical perspective. He fails to realize that the reason the Federal Government got involved in social welfare programs in the first place was because citizens' rights were not adequately protected by State and local governments. The few States that do attempt to meet their social responsibilities are the exceptions that prove the rule.

Last year, the Children's Defense Fund accused the Reagan administration of attacking programs from inside through changes in regulation. A process which is happening without publicity or fanfare and with little room for public discussion.

DAY CARE

Under current fiscal year 1981 Federal programs to assist child day care, the major source of operational funds—other than indirect funding through tax credits—continues to be programs financed under the Social Security Act.

Through the years the Congress has enacted a wide range of other legislation relating to child day care, including legislation authorizing the Head Start program, amendments to the National School Lunch Act authorizing the child care food program, the Education of the Handicapped Act, the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act, the Housing and Community Development Act, and others. A source of indirect Federal funding for child care is the Internal Revenue Code, which provides tax credits for families with child day care costs which are related to employment or education.

The growth in Federal day care funding has been brought to a halt by enactment of the Budget Reconciliation Act of 1981 (Public Law 97-35). Among many other changes, the Reconciliation Act provided for replacing the former title XX (of the Social Security Act) social services Federal-State matching program with a new title XX block grant program, with significantly reduced funding levels. Other changes made by the Reconciliation Act in the title XX program are the elimination of family income eligibility requirements, the elimination of the requirement that 50 percent of Federal funds be targeted on welfare recipients, and the elimination of Federal standards for day care.

Unfortunately, there is no single Federal child/day care program, which is why on March 10, 1981, I introduced H.R. 2387, the Child and Family Development Act. This legislation if passed, would strengthen the development of children and the functioning of families by establishing a comprehensive Federal child care program designed to improve the quality and availability of child care services while protecting parental rights. H.R. 2387 is now pending before the Human Resources Subcommittee awaiting hearings to be scheduled. In light of our ailing economy it is even more important that we provide a public forum so that the more than 30.7 million children under age 17 with mothers in the labor force can come together, focus on the child care problem and institute ways to ease the burden.

CHILD NUTRITION

The administration had the unmitigated gall to propose that the Agriculture Department change standards regarding the quantity and nutritional value of food served in the child nutrition program. Our youngsters could have been subjected to cake instead of bread, and catsup instead of real vegetables. What nonsense. After being inundated with protest, the President decided that perhaps his proposal did not provide any sound nutritional basis and he subsequently withdrew it.

MEDICAID

While this too would receive a warm welcome under Reagan's "New Federalism plan," it is another area in which drastic changes will occur through regulations being issued. Those regulations which were issued late last year could impact on programs which provide youngsters dental and preventive services and the full range of ambulatory services. Large numbers of children rely on medically needy programs. More will need to rely on it also as families lose welfare unemployment benefits and the like. The Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) is also thinking about gutting the enforcement of a program which requires certain hospitals to provide a portion of free care to the medically indigent and to serve medicaid/medicare patients. At a time when medicaid coverage is shrinking, such action will wreak havoc with those individuals who are already uninsured.

CHILD WELFARE

While this was spared the block grant fate last year, it faces almost certain death in the fiscal year 1983 round. Now States have to have a number of service plans in place in order that reforms be taken on behalf of homeless children in this Nation. Under the "New Federalism plan," this too will be bucked to the States.

The outlook remains bleak for those in our society who have small voices—the children. They are not organized in groups, they do not lobby their Representatives in Congress, they do not understand a President who creates safety nets and then cuts huge holes in the net.

Children do understand what it means to go without a hot, nourishing meal at school, what it means when mother or dad receives a letter stating that because of budget cuts, 350 day care slots are being eliminated and they are faced with what to do with Sandy or George after school.

I, for one, do not wish to be a party to our children growing old and worried before they reach adulthood. I certainly do not wish to be party to a plan which may mean our youngsters will not receive adequate child care, housing, food or clothing.

In closing, I would like to share with you an assessment of budget cuts on black children as prepared by the National Black Child Development Institute.

The article follows:

When you consider:

Almost half of Black children are born in poverty;

40 percent of Black women head households, which count for 44 percent of Black children;

Black teenage unemployment has remained at 30 percent for the last 10 years and during the summer of 1981 it rose to 45 percent (National Urban League);

Over 40 percent of all Black children do not see a single physician each year;

Black women are twice as likely as whites to never have prenatal care;

As many as one-fifth of all births to Black teenagers result in low birth weight babies;

The infant mortality rate for Black babies is almost twice those of white; and

The number of poor white families declined by 6 percent between 1970 and 1979, the number of poor Black families increased by 12 percent (National Urban League).

It is obvious many of the 1982 cuts in social services programs have left the Black community hanging by a thread. Now, the President has released plans for his revolution in Federalism. Already, a 12 percent reduction across the board has been recommended.

To speak of the effects of budget cuts and Black children, five critical issues need to be considered, namely child care, education, health, child welfare, and AFDC.

CHILD CARE

Many Black families rely on relatives for child care. This is an indication not only that the Black extended family is still a strength in the Black community, but the Black parents have little or no choice when seeking child care services so they can work. Clearly, there is a need for a greater supply of accessible, affordable and quality child care. Title XX provides such an option. By 1990, it is estimated three-quarters of all mothers will be in the work force. With the average cost of child care at an all time high of $45 to $50 per week, and as the flow of mothers in the labor force continues, many families will continue to suffer from an insufficient and prohibitively expensive supply of child care options.

Recent studies have shown women workers are more often unemployed, unemployed over longer periods of time, are underemployed, underpaid, have less union protection, and have more interruption in labor force participation. (Diana M. Pearce, Center for National Policy Review and Harriette McAdoo, Howard University.) The implications for the 44 percent of Black children who live in households headed by Black women are overwhelming.

To cut Title XX funds 12 percent would cause over 50,000 children to lose their day care slots, numerous centers would close, and eligibility requirements for subsidies would lower, thus forcing thousands of parents to quit work to give their children proper care.

EDUCATION

Education has always been regarded as the principal vehicle through which Blacks can improve their lives. In specific instances, disadvantaged students have particularly demonstrated their responsiveness to genuine educational opportunities. Title I of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act has proven valuable in improving the math and reading skills of its students. However, due to lack of full funding only 57 percent of eligible students are participating. A cut of 12 percent in Title I would eliminate over 500,000 children from the program. The cost-effectiveness of this move is doubtful, when the same 500,000 children could, if not for Title I, later become more expensive because of the need to place them in EMR classes of SLD programs.

HEALTH

Black children are much more likely to suffer from poor health than the majority of their American peers. While poverty, unsafe housing, and poor nutrition expose many Black children to harmful and hazardous condition, their plight is compounded by a systematic inaccessibility to competent health care. When we realize only 58 percent of Black children have ever received an inoculation against measles, and less than half of all Black children have received three polio dosages as recommended, and that the Medicaid program is the major source of health care for the poor, further cuts in Medicaid are frightening. The level of medicaid funding states receive is already minimal, and far below that which is needed to maintain the current level of services. A 12 percent cut would result in severe medicaid cutbacks by the states. As a result, thousands of already underserved children will be eliminated.

CHILD WELFARE

Black children have been, and continue to be grossly mis-served by the child welfare system. It is believed they comprise from 28 percent to 40 percent of the 500,000 children living in foster care homes and institutions. Our foster care system is guilty, not only of placing black children in care more frequently, but also keeping them in care longer, and providing them with the least expensive care possible. To put child welfare into a block grant will devastate a foster care and adoption system that already does not serve the needs of Black children. If the programs in P.L. 96-272 are block granted, all new incentives for states to reform their programs will be ended, In addition, most federal control would be removed, thus leaving states free to distribute funds in areas they deem most important. This is particularly disturbing in reference to Black children who are disproportionately placed in foster care, disproportionately kept in foster care, and disproportionately prevented from finding permanent homes.

AID TO FAMILIES WITH DEPENDENT CHILDREN (AFDC)

The Administration plans sweeping alterations in the AFDC program which will profoundly harm Black children and their families. The Administration proposes to "swap" AFDC and food stamps for medicaid—a $20 billion exchange. The states will be given a $28 billion trust fund to finance them, however, how the money will be spent will be left completely up to the states. It is unreasonable to think states can answer responsibly the needs of AFDC recipients, when they are trying desperately to balance their own budgets in light of substantial cutbacks. (Black Caucus Response to the State of the Union Address) This transfer is detrimental to the economic well being of 7.5 million of America's poorest children. But, when you consider one-half of Black children are born in poverty, they will suffer more under the sharp edge of the budget axe.

The problems for many Black children discussed today only begin to show the tremendous disparity between the majority of children and poor Blacks. Although their vulnerability to poverty and discrimination accounts for much of the gap, Black children also receive inadequate, underfunded, or misdirected services that do not address their enormous social and economic barriers. If any relief is to occur soon, the government must begin to design services that recognize and utilize the strengths of Black families, not just their deficits.●

● Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Speaker, it is ironic that in the same week that we are celebrating the 100th anniversary of the birth of Franklin Delano Roosevelt, who responded some 50 years ago to the needs of a citizenry which was illhoused, illfed, and illclothed, we heard from the President of his plans to dismantle the social programs initiated by F. D. R.

In his plans, President Reagan proposes to give to the States precisely those responsibilities the States had originally failed to meet. The Federal Government had to assume responsibility for guaranteeing food for the hungry and care for the sick and needy because many State and local governments refused to do so. Now the President suggests to people that if their State fails them, they are free to move. This brings back the terrible memories of the migrations during and suffering during the Depression.

I would like to add my voice to that of my colleagues who share the belief that children will suffer the most as a direct result of this administration's actions. Children are presently the poorest group in the county. In 1978, when 11.4 percent of the general population lived in poverty, yet, 15.9 percent of children were poverty stricken. It is often stated that our children are our greatest resource. We also know that nations are judged by the way they treat their very old and their very young.

I believe that our youngest citizens, those who are too young to vote, too young to demonstrate, and too young to lobby are in serious jeopardy. The administration has reduced or is seeking to reduce the funding for the programs that have proven to be successful in improving the health and welfare of our children. The mistakes we make today may lead to irreversible damage for them. Children deprived of adequate food, adequate health care, and adequate education will grow up to join the ranks of the unskilled and the unemployed. Our children are entitled to food, health care, and a decent education to enable them to have a future which will be free of poverty.●

● Mr. HARKIN. Mr. Speaker, we frequently mention the natural resources of this country, we discuss quality and quantity. I will say to you that there is nothing more sacred than the natural resource we have in our children and young people. The oft heard expression is that healthy bodies lead to healthy minds. Well frankly, I put a premium on the healthy bodies and the healthy minds of our future generations; I will also say to you that this is not shared by the current administration.

During World War II we began drafting young men to serve in the armed services only to find that there were terrible cases of malnutrition. At that time the Federal Government stood up and took notice—the school lunch program was created. What's happening to that lunch program today? Across the country there has been a 12-percent drop in participation. Why? Because it seems that the priorities of the budget makers at the Office of Management and Budget and in the White House are not directed at providing an affordable meal to our schoolchildren.

What about the special milk program? Last year children were able to receive extra milk through the special supplemental milk program. In 1980-81 there were 800 Iowa schools that provided their children with supplemental milk. The wise sages in the administration decided that children did not need more than one carton of milk with their school lunch and therefore forbade schools who participate in the lunch program to also participate in the special milk program. What about those growing teenagers who need larger supplies of calcium and vitamin D? Well they are relegated to one milk per lunch without having to pay an exorbitant price. Today in Iowa there are only 50 schools that participate in the special milk program.

We are constantly told of the waste, fraud, and abuse in the food stamp program. The response from the administration is to cut the working poor out of the program, the single parent families, those who desperately need nutritional support to supplement those hard earned dollars. Who are those poor recipients—58 percent are children under 18; and this mornng we hear that the administation wants to cut another $2.4 billion from the food stamp program. These cuts are not aimed at waste, fraud and abuse—these cuts are aimed at needy children.

Study after study has indicated that the WIC program has reduced mortality and improved the health of low-income children. Every dollar spent on this program saves $3 in costs to care for a brain damaged, retarded, or otherwise nonself-sufficient child and later adult. Yet we read this morning in the Washington Post that the President will recommend that this program be cut by 25 percent.

Let us focus on the nutritional needs of children and long-term needs of this country in a sensible manner. We must stop gutting the very programs that create healthy bodies and minds, or we will soon find ourselves in the state the Field Foundation Study found the country in during the late sixties.●

● Mr. GORE. Mr. Speaker, countless times we have heard the expression, "our children are our future." This is a true statement. And without a doubt, this discussion about the impact of Federal budget cuts on our Nation's children is one of the most crucial examinations of the effects of budget reductions that we could ever undertake—because in our assessments of the consequences of cutbacks on our children, we can also gauge, to a certain extent, the true cost of budget cutbacks. The budget decisions that are being made in the White House and in the Halls of Congress that affect our Nation's children will have a lasting impact—on them, and on the future of our children.

It is my belief, and I know it is shared by many of you, that the future of many of our children is being compromised. Drastic reductions in nutrition, health, education, and other social services programs will exact a severe toll from our children, our most vulnerable and least powerful group.

I have heard first hand from many of my constituents, as I know you have, about how budget cuts are hurting them and their families. The outcome of cutbacks in one program in particular—the school lunch program—have been brought to my attention numerous times by parents, teachers, and students in my home State of Tennessee. The budget reductions have resulted in some schools terminating participation in the program, increased meal prices, and fewer students eating meals. In Tennessee alone, the average daily participation rate in the school lunch program has fallen by over 67,000 students, approximately an 8-percent drop in participation when compared with November 1980 statistics.

I have a letter from a student in my district that I would like to share with you that I think points out the effects of the school lunch cutbacks on many students across the Nation. The letter was written by Cindy Williams, a junior at Beech Senior High in Hendersonville, Tenn. In her letter, she wrote:

> One issue that bothers the students and myself is the school lunches. We would like to know why one hamburger, maybe twenty french fries and two packs of ketchup costs us one-dollar? Our desserts are thirty-cents extra and one pint of milk is twenty-cents. Why are school lunch prices going up while the quantity is going down? Everyone insists that growing children need good food for good learning. At school lunch prices this is not possible for more than half of (the) families.

As Cindy said, children do need "good food for good learning." We all know that poor nutrition affects both the physical and mental development of children and has an influence on the remaining years of their lives. It has also been proven that malnutrition among children leads to low school achievement. These facts are known. Yet, unfortunately, severe reductions were made in the school lunch program and more cuts are likely to be proposed in the next few weeks.

Although the national school lunch program was established in 1946, it is still needed in the 1980's to help safeguard the health and well-being of our Nation's young people. Adequate funding must be provided for the school lunch program to help insure that students receive the nutrition they need to grow up physically and mentally strong.

There are other cuts that impact just as heavily on children. I will touch on just a few of the major ones, which include reductions in aid to families with dependent children, health and education programs.

In September 1981, the Tennessee Human Services Department had a cash assistance caseload of 66,067 families. In October 1981 that caseload was reduced to 55,021 families; 11,046 families were simply budgeted out of the program through new program requirements designed to accomplish that end. Naturally, those most affected by the cuts in this program are children. In Tennessee, the average family participating in the AFDC program consists of a parent and one or two children. In the majority of these cases, no father figure is present. Regretably, for most of the families removed from the program, the result is likely a deeper step into poverty.

Another area of assistance crucially important to children is health care. It is generally recognized that proper medical care is vital. And fortunately, overall, the health of children in the United States is good. One reason for this is that the Federal Government provides funding for a wide variety of programs that seek to improve children's health and provide care when it cannot be afforded. But we are also seeing cutbacks in the health programs. Many of them have been placed in block grants and then overall funding slashed. Medicaid is under attack and the program may be drastically changed in the very near future. Any changes in programs that provide medical care would undoubtedly hurt children, because the outcome would be that children whose families cannot afford private physicians may not be able to receive adequate health care. This would be a devastating setback after many years of progress in the area of providing expanded health care to young people.

Finally, but by no means less painful, are the cutbacks in education programs. Since most of these programs are forward funded, the true effects of the first round of reductions will not be apparent until the beginning of the next school year. At that time, however, less moneys will be available for the education of handicapped students. Fewer funds will be allocated to meet the special needs of economically disadvantaged children. And many other young people may not find programs such as alcohol and drug abuse education, career education, and health education programs available. These programs were placed in a block grant along with many other programs and then funding slashed. State and local educational agencies will be placed in an either/or predicament in deciding which activities to fund with block grant moneys.

To make matters worse, indications are that the administration's fiscal year 1983 budget will call for cutting education aid by about one-third. Furthermore, the education program for handicapped children, which is successfully working to provide an appropriate education to millions of handicapped youth, is slated for inclusion in a block grant. Clearly, such drastic budget action will have a profound effect on millions of our Nation's young people. At a time in our history when education is a necessity, it is vital that every child has the opportunity to realize his or her fullest potential.

The time to provide for the needs of our Nation's children is now. Their future should not be compromised by heartless cutbacks in vital nutrition, health, education, and welfare programs.●

● Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, Reaganomics have proven to be a cruel hoax on the American people. Given the staggering impact of a severely depressed State economy, a failing automobile industry with skyrocketing unemployment, and drastic cuts in trade adjustment assistance, food stamps, unemployment benefits, and other Federal programs which give basic support to families, my constituents are shouldering too great a burden.

But the greatest burden is falling on those whose futures are being traded in an economic experiment and misguided attempts to balance the budget—our children. From infancy to graduation, the Federal budget cuts are impacting our children's lives. From the reduced and empty school breakfast and lunch plates, to understaffed classrooms, empty libraries, and college careers that will never get underway, we are robbing our children of chances and opportunities which we will never be able to calculate.

School dollars have been so stretched in my home district that in one school district there has been no physical education, music or library facilities in the elementary school for years.

And at the high school level, course offerings have been so curtailed that only the basic skeleton of a curriculum remains. The threat of a 25 to 50 percent additional cut in Federal education aid sends shock waves into a school district like this that has already made these hard decisions. In Michigan, the State share of education costs has dipped from about 50 percent in 1979-80 to about 30 percent in the current fiscal year. Any further cuts will only aggravate an already critical situation.

The administration is planning still more experiments with programs which serve children. Even though many States have not yet appointed the first education block grant advisory committee, and not gotten any program underway, the President is pressing for another wave of consolidation. This time his target is the handicapped population. Here my State and, indeed the Nation, have made great strides in giving handicapped children hope and opportunities for the future which they never before enjoyed. This system should not be tampered with until we have at least an inkling of an idea whether this first chancy endeavor is wise public policy.

Any more changes in our proven education system should be made with great caution. When our children's livelihood and futures are at stake, we cannot be too hesitant in setting our course. Our children are our most valuable resource, one that we can ill afford to use for expedient political experimentation.●

● Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to discuss the impact of Federal budget cuts on children. It is disheartening, indeed, when the road to economic recovery proves to be paved with cobblestones of reduced health care, education, and social services to childen in need. It is a cliché, yet it is true: children are the future of our Nation. A road based on reduced care to children and parents must, therefore, necessarily lead not to "economic recovery," but to a weakened and dispirited nation.

The range of children's services that can be discussed under this heading is quite broad: Child nutrition, maternal and child health, education, day care and maternal employment, aid to families with dependent children, and medicaid are a number that our colleague from New York has mentioned. I would like to focus on the programs that come under the jurisdiction of the Health and Environment Subcommittee on which I serve—specifically, the maternal and child health programs and medicaid.

As many of you know, President Reagan requested that a number of programs providing services to pregnant women and children be consolidated into one large, general block grant. The Subcommittee on Health and Environment succeeded in establishing a maternal and child health block grant that retained, at the least, a specified, targeted framework for many of the maternal and child health programs. However, these programs were severely slashed by the President's appropriations request; and women and children across the Nation are now beginning to feel the resulting impact.

Let us look at some of the specific programs. The improved pregnancy outcome projects and the improved child health projects are two initiatives now being funded through the maternal and child health (MCH) block grant. In recent years, these projects have resulted in improving accessibility, availability, and quality of prenatal care. They have also facilitated outreach, patient and provider education, and targeted research on prenatal care. Yet, in initial drafts that we have seen, the improved pregnancy outcome projects are being reduced by 60 percent, from $11.1 million to $4.4 million; and the improved child health projects are being reduced by 72 percent, from $3.2 million to $0.9 million.

Another of the programs currently in the MCH block grant—the university affiliated programs—will suffer comparable setbacks. Funded in fiscal year 1981 at $18.7 million, these programs, which deliver essential services to handicapped children across the country and engage in vital research, will be reduced by 46 percent in fiscal year 1982. The number of these programs will now be slashed, support for undergraduate training will be eliminated, and funding for various inpatient care and ambulatory services will no longer be available. I am personally acquainted with the fine work that the Kennedy Institute, a UAP in my district, has done for the handicapped children of Maryland. It is distressing to comprehend the effect that the reduction and elimination of these programs, as well as others under the MCH block grant, will have on children and parents of other States as well.

Many of the cuts in medicaid will be as extensive and devastating. Through changes requested by the President, we have given the States greater flexibility in administering their programs; and simultaneously, we have reduced the percentage that the Federal Government will pay the States in matching funds. Thus, throughout 1982, we will be seeing States tighten their eligibility requirements and cut back on their benefit packages in efforts to save money and make up the Federal shortfall.

The two populations that make up the largest number of medicaid beneficiaries are the very young and the very old—and these are the two which will suffer the most. The aspect of preventive health care and maintenance for young children will take a back seat to avoiding short-term deficits caused by the Federal shortfall. In the long run, this will result in the poor health status of adolescents and adults—generating additional financial, physical, and emotional costs.

Mr. Speaker, I believe we must continue to speak out against the extensive service reductions that have been and will be proposed by the current administration. Thus, the Subcommittee on Health and Environment is moving ahead with various oversight hearings, and I continue to work with my colleagues in keeping the basic issue of child health alive in the national debate. As many of us have noted, our Nation's future will be only as bright as our children's present.●

● Ms. FERRARO. Mr. Speaker, I want to commend my good friend, the gentleman from New York (Mr. WEISS) for taking out this special order on the impact of the Reagan budget cuts on America's children. Through the legislative battles that resulted in the enactment of many of the programs that are now threatened with extinction, we developed a national consensus that our greatest resource was our children, and a commitment to providing improved education, nutrition, and health care for them.

The Reagan budget cuts that have already been adopted stalled progress in meeting that commitment; the new proposals in his 1983 budget would completely abandon it. The American people have given no mandate to turn our backs on disadvantaged and middle-class children. It is tragically ironic that an administration that seeks to revive our economy and improve productivity has attacked programs for children, such as title I compensatory education, that give children a chance to contribute to our economic growth.

The Reagan attack on children's programs covers a broad range of programs.

Children's futures are most often determined by the economic and social status of their parents, primarily their mothers. In the case of children from low-income families, current Federal child care policies are inadequate to insure that these children will lead healthy and productive lives. Federal policies and programs are diffused and often do not reflect an accurate view of the severe handicaps under which these children and their parents must function. These problems, coupled with the administration's proposed budget cuts, will seriously impede their chances to move out of the cycle of poverty and dependence.

Fifty-four percent of the 31.8 million children in the United States under the age of 18 have mothers who work away from home. One out of every six families, or 9.4 million families, is headed by a woman. These glaring statistics immediately raise the questions, who are caring for these children and what kind of care are they receiving? Currently there are only 1.6 million licensed child care spaces for the 7 million children under age 6 who have working mothers, which indicates that over 5 million children are in need of day care facilities. The concern for quality care should not be viewed as a problem primarily for individual mothers, but one that should concern us all—expecially employers who are faced with high absenteeism and low productivity when child care arrangements are inadequate or unreliable. We need to take a closer look both at alternative forms of quality child care and work options such as job sharing and flextime arrangements.

The impact of the budget cuts can be devastating for local economies when day care centers have to close for lack of funding. These centers are not autonomous. There are small businesses that provide ancillary services which are tied to it such as food and beverage vendors, suppliers of educational, office, housekeeping, and first aid materials, and auditors—all of whom are taxpayers. In my own State of New York, for example, of the 57 local districts, excluding New York City, 19,722 people are involved in day care as providers and consumers. In New York City, for fiscal year 1982, the operation of 44 day care centers covered by the social services block grant is jeopardized. These centers provide full-time and after-school care for approximately 5,000 children of working mothers throughout the city. If services were to be dismantled, the loss of tax revenues and increases in welfare payments would be felt local and statewide; but most important, if parents must work and have no help for child care, thousands of children will be left unprotected. Multiply this by thousands of local communities across the country and you can see that we are faced with a serious problem that will have long negative effects on the total economy.

Aid to families with dependent children, which was cut by over $1 billion last year, will be cut by an additional $1.1 billion for fiscal 1983. Of the 3.9 million households now receiving AFDC benefits, it is estimated that 687,000 will be hurt by the budget cuts: 404,000 will be terminated, and 279,000 will receive reduced benefits. With the President's "New Federalism," States will go into a tailspin in an attempt to recoup the losses of the 50-percent Federal payment, and I would venture to say, the effects will be chaotic. Those households with earnings would lose more without earnings and after elimination of Federal work incentives, households with low earnings would have no more money than those with no earnings at all.

The whole concept of work fare—States requiring recipients to work in exchange for benefits—does not appear to be an incentive for economic self-sufficiency in that the training, job counseling, and labor market services included in the original work incentive program (WIN) will no longer be provided. Stricter eligibility provisions will terminate AFDC benefits for 12,000 of New York City's working poor, reduce benefits for 93,000 recipients, and increase city costs by $7.6 million through shifts of 20,000 recipients to home relief and cutbacks in federally reimbursable child care expenses.

One of the most comprehensive and enriching programs designed for the education of young children has been Head Start. It will be maintained at the 1982 level of $912 million with no additional increases. This preschool program offers medical, nutritional, and social services. The Federal Government provides 80 percent of the operating costs, and 90 percent of the children Head Start serves are from families with low incomes. Because we believe every child deserves a head start, funding the program at the present level will reduce the number of children who can participate. The alternatives to this are frightening: Children will be placed in unsafe environments, there will be a greater incidence of child abuse resulting from the frustration and vulnerability parents are experiencing, and early learning experiences that would help to reduce delinquency, increase social competence, and improve attitudes toward school will be short circuited by a shortsighted political ideology.

The maternal and child health block grant has now been extended to include WIC, the special supplemental food program for women, infants, and children with an overall funding level of $1 billion for fiscal 1983. States are required to spend $3 for every $4 Federal dollars received under this block grant. The program must be coordinated with the State's medicaid, early and periodic screening, diagnostic, and treatment programs, and related educational, developmental, and family planning programs. The requirement that States spend 15 percent of their funds on programs of regional and national significance may leave a lot to be desired in terms of direct, quality service delivery based on individual States' interpretation of the requirement. WIC, as a separate program, has been found to be cost effective and cost efficient. For each $1 spent on the prenatal component, there has been a savings of $3 in hospitalization costs related to a reduction of the number of low birth weight infants requiring extended hospital care. The program, as part of a block grant, services for women, infants, and children, with overall reduced funding will not allow us to explore ways in which accessibility, availability, and utilization of services can be improved.

Another major concern is child nutrition and the school lunch program. The President proposes to cut these programs by $265 million, which will terminate the special milk and summer feeding programs and curb breakfast subsidies. The long-term reprecussions of this proposal are obvious and the wisdom of "an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure" admonition should not be lost in our consideration of this vital issue. Carl Rowen, in his Washington Post column, August 27, 1981, made the point most succinctly:

> Women who head families work some atrocious hours—so a school lunch, even a school breakfast, can mean the difference as to whether their children become contributing members of this society or go on as just one of a string of generations living off the compassion and generosity of other members of society.

A reduction in medicaid of $2 billion for fiscal 1983 will severely reduce the number of sick and needy persons having access to medical care. In addition, States like New York, which is one of five States that share the costs 50-50 with the Government—25 percent New York State and 25 percent New York City—would experience a tremendous reduction of eligibility and benefit levels. There will be a reduction of $78 million in the Federal medicaid share for optional services, family planning, and medicare premiums. New York City's Mayor Koch has stated:

A Federal takeover of medicaid would result in dramatic and unfair cutbacks in the program, so that the poor and elderly would be unable to receive the health care they deserve * * *

Nationalization will return us to the very social conditions that medicaid was created to alleviate 15 years ago. In 1965, for example, for every live birth there were 25 infant deaths and 11 years later, due to access and availability of care, the infant mortality rate had dropped to 15 deaths per every 1,000 live births. This reduction can partially be attributed to the fact that some 1 million pregnant women and children receive health care through medicaid annually.

To cut programs that have helped to remove a vast number of children and families from the cycle of proverty through proper health care, nutrition, work incentives, and child care programs is an unconscionable indictment for a progressive society, particularly in view of the fact that poverty is increasing. The Census Bureau reports that in 1980, 13 percent of the population or 29.3 million persons, were living below the poverty level which is $8,414 for a nonfarm family of 4. It is estimated that the spread of poverty will continue through at least this first half of the eighties. We must accept the challenge of providing the necessary leadership to develop policies that will halt this trend and to devise strategies to aggressively implement them.●

TRIBUTE TO HON. JAMES C. DAVIS

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. LEVITAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks and include extraneous material in connection with my special order today.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEVITAS. Mr. Speaker, last week I announced the death of a former Member of the House, the Honorable James C. Davis of Georgia. Former Congressman Davis died on December 28, 1981, at the age of 86, having served for 16 years in the U.S. House of Representatives, from 1946 to 1963.

It is one of the unhappy tasks which Members of the House have to announce the death of former Members who were their predecessors in office, and to provide the opportunity for Members who served with these individuals or who knew them to have the opportunity by way of such a special order to commemorate or memorialize their memory.

Mr. Speaker, the Honorable James C. Davis served as a Member of Congress for 16 years, representing the old Fifth District of Georgia which encompasses all of my present district as well as portions of Congressman WYCHE FOWLER'S and Congressman NEWT GINGRICH'S districts.

Judge Davis, as he was known from the days he served as a superior court judge in the Stone Mountain Circuit of Georgia, was a man of rigid principle during his years of service in Congress and until his death. He proudly proclaimed his conservative views and was consistent in applying them in action.

As a youngster, I remember Judge Davis as the first U.S. Congressman I ever recall seeing in person. He looked like the role. Judge Davis was a fine figure of a man. He stood 6 foot 4 inches and weighed a solid 240 pounds. He looked something like a rosy-cheeked, white-thatched bulldog—an incongrous thought but surely he possessed that same tenacity.

He came from a different political era than I do and there were many of his political positions that I strongly disagreed with as fervently as he professed them. The changing face of the modern new South, which I felt I was part of, was perceived by Judge Davis, I think, with sincere concern and he felt it his duty to resist those tides of change. While many of us sharply disagreed with Judge Davis we did not question his sincerity, commitment or integrity. When times were changing, he did not. He stuck to his deeply held convictions even when he realized they might lead to his politial defeat in a changing political climate and in a reapportioned congressional district and in a reformed electoral system.

There were aspects of Judge Davis' service in Congress that are exemplary. He worked hard and conscientiously to serve the needs of all of his constituents—friend and foe alike. He was personally devoting himself to casework before that term came into vogue in Congress. Once in a political campaign an opponent had a slogan about "Getting the Job Done"; Judge Davis countered this saying "Davis will do the job himself." Realizing the water, energy, and recreation needs of a growing area of the country, Judge Davis worked tirelessly to bring about the construction of Lake Sidney Lanier just outside of Atlanta.

Also his belief in the free enterprise system, the concern about too much government, too much spending, too much regulation and fiscal irresponsibility were of concern to Judge Davis before their current popularity.

James C. Davis served his State and Nation for nearly half a century; he was a fighting marine in World War I; he was a member of the Georgia State Legislature (1924-28) and judge of the Superior Court of De Kalb County. After he left Congress, he published the Atlanta Times. A newspaper he founded to promote his views of conservative, constitutional government.

Judge Davis is survived by his beloved daughter, Mary Martin Bowen of Atlanta, and two sisters, Mrs. Frank Burns of Palm Beach, Fla. and Mrs. Mary Davis McKinnon of Atlanta.

The following tribute to James C. Davis was prepared by Chris Brady, a former staff member who worked with the judge during his last years in Congress. Mr. Brady, who lives in Atlanta, was both an employee and friend of Judge Davis and other friends, family, and coworkers agree that he is most qualified to offer a fitting tribute to former U.S. Representative James C. Davis which I here place in the RECORD:

TRIBUTE TO THE HONORABLE JAMES C. DAVIS BY CHRIS BRADY

An American patriot is dead.

The Honorable James C. Davis of Stone Mountain, Georgia, died on December 28, 1981, at the age of 86.

Judge Davis was a former senior member of the U.S. House of Representatives, having served for 16 years (1946-63). He represented the old Fifth Congressional District of Georgia, which encompassed DeKalb, Rockdale and Fulton Counties.

James Curran Davis was a conservative man. And he possessed to the fullest measure the true conservative's conviction that the greatness of a nation flowed not from the federal bureaucracy but from the free, unfettered spirit of the people themselves.

Judge Davis was an old-fashioned man—a man born of another century, a man who believed heart and soul in the simple virtues of work, thrift, self-reliance and unabashed patriotism.

It was these virtues (he often said) that had transformed this country of ours from a wilderness to the first nation of the world in hardly more than the blink of an eye.

And it was these virtues that, in his judgment, would add to the greatness and to the glory of the 20th century.

But it was a lonely trumpet that Judge Davis sounded.

He stood in the well of the House during his day and time and called out again and again for fiscal responsibility * * * for a balanced budget * * * for the reduction of the national debt * * * for the strict adherence to the Constitution.

He pleaded for a government that could see that federal interference in every phase of our life was the ultimate put down of a free people.

He demanded a government that was tough enough and, yes, wise enough to admit that it had no moral right to spend money it did not have for programs it could not afford.

He argued that the extravagance of government was breaking the back of the hard-working productive people—but that, come what may, government could never guarantee a standard of living for the unproductive.

He preached his sermon that federal regulation, moving ever closer to federal regimentation, was robbing the free enterprise system of the rousing, creative vitality that, simply enough, had produced for us a standard of living unknown to any other society.

Judge Davis had strong-hearted allies, men like Judge Howard Smith of Virginia, H. R. Gross of Iowa, Bill Colmer of Mississippi and others. But they were few in number and their views seldom prevailed.

His critics—and they were legion—said that Judge Davis was "heartless" in his opposition to welfare programs. They called him a reactionary and a political neanderthal who saw shadows of economic disaster where none existed.

Given the choice of moderating his views or facing certain defeat in the election of 1962, Judge Davis remained true to himself. Afterwards, he told a friend:

"I am an old man and I may not live to see it—I hope I don't—but somewhere down the road lies a terrible day of reckoning. You cannot with impunity debauch a nation's currency; you cannot pander to the greedy demand for more, more, always more without destroying the nation's work ethic and its moral fiber.

"It is our children who will be saddled with the burden of paying the price for the excesses of government. I hope they will not come to hate us for what we are doing to them."

So spoke James C. Davis twenty years ago.

He lived to see his forecast come true. He lived to see double-digit inflation * * * double-digit interest rates * * * a trillion dollar national debt * * * the highest unemployment rate since the Great Depression * * * and the lowest rate of productivity in the free world.

And yes, he lived to see his political philosophy vindicated by the American people in the 1980 Presidential election.

But, Judge Davis would not comfort in the fact that he was right when so many were wrong. For the road to economic recovery will be long and painful, and he loved America too deeply to see it suffer.

Judge Davis was an old-fashioned man. He answered to a stern and righteous God. Chills ran up his spine when Old Glory passed in review. The Holy Bible and the Constitution of the United States were the only true writ.

His sense of patriotism was so profound that the National Anthem was his favorite song. He despised any "ism" that was alien to Americanism, and he believed, with apologies to no one, that the best foreign policy was a strong military organization.

No remembrance of James C. Davis would be complete without reference to the woman whom he had adored for nearly 40 years. Mary Lou Davis was his wife, his best friend, his partner, his strong right arm.

If Judge Davis had any apprehension about his role in politics it was the fear that the incessant attacks on him might affect her. But Mary Lou Davis was as strong as he was philosophically, and believed no less than he did in the rightness of the conservative cause. She passed away in 1929.

● Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, it is with sadness that I join my colleagues in honoring the late Judge James C. Davis, a former Member of the House from Georgia. Judge Davis was held in high esteem during his tenure in office. As a Member during the time he served, I found Jim Davis to be an able and dedicated public servant, who was a credit to public office and to the Congress.

Jim was always a voice of reason and sound public policy. He accepted and filled with distinction many committee assignments and established a reputation as an intelligent and diligent Member. He was an outstanding legislator with an effective parliamentary style.

Judge Davis brought honor and distinction to this Chamber and while we are saddened by his death, we are indeed fortunate to have benefited from his contributions.

I join in extending my sympathies to his family and many friends.●

● Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I was saddened to learn of the death of Hon. James C. Davis of Georgia, a former Member of this House and a colleague who served with me for 8 years. I remember Judge Davis as a decent and forthright man, who served his constituents well throughout his term in the Congress. Although we did not always agree or vote alike, he was a fine and courtly gentleman who was greatly respected for his views and his dedicated service to his own constituents.●

● Mr. BRINKLEY. Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to participate in this special order honoring the memory of a distinguished former Member of this body from my home State of Georgia, Hon. James C. Davis, who passed away on December 28, 1981.

Jim Davis represented Georgia's Fifth Congressional District for seven terms, from the 80th through the 87th Congress. He served as a member of the Post Office and Civil Service Committee and the District of Columbia Committee. He worked hard on the successful appropriations which enabled construction of the important Buford Dam and the formation of Georgia's nationally famous Lake Lanier. Jim also served his State and his country in other fields—as a marine in World War I, as an attorney, as a newspaper publisher, and as a judge of the DeKalb County Superior Court.

Jim was a man of uncommon initiative and perseverance. In fact, he passed the tough Georgia bar examination in 1919 after studying law on his own, without ever having attended law school.

Jim Davis was a firm believer in the principle of fiscal conservatism, and he practiced his beliefs with conviction and legislative skill. My thoughts and prayers go out to his daughter, sisters, and grandchildren in their great loss.●

INTEREST-BEARING CHECKING ACCOUNTS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. GRADISON) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. GRADISON. Mr. Speaker, today I have introduced H.R. 5414, a bill that would allow State and local governments to establish interest-bearing checking accounts. This legislation would make negotiable order of withdrawal (NOW) accounts available to local officials who seek to make better use of public funds.

NOW accounts became a nationwide reality with the passage of the Consumer Checking Account Equity Act on December 31, 1980. Before that date, federally regulated depository institutions were prevented from paying interest on funds deposited in checking accounts. The class of depositors currently eligible to maintain NOW accounts under this act include those whose deposits—

> Consist solely of funds in which the entire beneficial interest is held by one or more individuals or by an organization which is operated primarily for religious, philanthropic, charitable, education or other similar purposes and which is not operated for profit.

Although Congress intended only to limit the access of commercial entities to NOW accounts, general purpose governmental units have been prevented from using these accounts because of restrictive judicial interpretations of this legislative language. Government funds held in a checking account can receive interest only when used exclusively by schools, libraries, colleges, and hospitals or other educational and medical facilities.

Recent budget cuts have reduced Federal assistance to State and local governments by $13 billion and the Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981 may result in an additional $2.3 billion in revenue losses according to the National League of Cities. A survey by the National Governors Association found that over 30 States operated at a deficit in 1981. The city of Cincinnati, Ohio, which I represent, has indicated that an estimated $24 million less in Federal funds will be available to it this year than in 1981. My bill would allow general purpose governmental units to receive interest on their checking deposits thereby providing additional funds for financially troubled States and localities.

In testimony before the Senate Banking Committee last year, the Municipal Finance Officers Association reported that an estimated $11.3 billion of State and local funds were deposited in demand accounts at the end of 1980. The bulk of that public money rests in bank checking accounts which cannot pay interest unless the funds are used for a narrow range of purposes. It is irresponsible to curtail Federal revenue available to States and muncipalities without at least allowing their funds to earn a fair rate of return in the marketplace. The Federal Government already receives much higher rates of interest by storing surplus funds in interest-bearing "tax and loan accounts."

Several bills have been offered that would accomplish this same result, including S. 1689, introduced by Senator LUGAR, and H.R. 4947, introduced by Representative LUNDINE. All three of us have had the honor of serving as mayors and all three of us understand the need for this important regulatory reform. Had the $11.3 billion of State and local funds held in demand deposits been placed in interest-bearing NOW accounts, a minimum of $593 million in interest revenue would have been earned. These funds could have hired more policemen and firemen, built more parks, hired more unemployed youth, and increased the broad spectrum of State and city services that are being curtailed nationally in the wake of budgetary shortages. It is silly to deprive our localities of these opportunities when this is not congressional intent.

Banks have circumvented this interest prohibition by offering repurchase agreements to their governmental depositors. Under these agreements, a bank, when notified, will use a set portion of its depositor's checking balance to purchase T-bills, after agreeing to repurchase the securities with interest in a short period of time. This system is not always available, especially to smaller jurisdictions which lack both the skilled money managers and the required minimum balances to enter these markets. A moderate amount of foresight is necessary to arrange a repurchase agreement and, if too much money is committed, the locality can easily become overextended. Even with a repurchase agreement, most localities must also hold additional general checking funds to pay their bills or to meet emergencies.

Last year, both the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, which regulates banks, and the Federal Home Loan Bank Board (FHLBB), which regulates savings and loans (S. & L.'s), issued rules to clarify the class of depositors eligible to maintain NOW accounts. The FHLBB found that "an interpretation of the eligibility criteria to include (general purpose) Government entities is both reasonable and consistent with the deregulatory intent underlying the 1980 amendment." They stated that allowing general purpose Government accounts to accumulate interest "benefits member institutions, their public unit customers and taxpayers in general" by increasing the amount of these public funds.

The Federal Reserve System, however, specifically limited commercial banks from offering interest-bearing NOW accounts for general purpose Government functions. This discrepancy in the treatment of banks and S. & L.'s provoked the American Bankers' Association (ABA) to challenge the FHLBB's more lenient interpretation. In the ABA's view, local governments would have transferred funds from banks to S. & L.'s who would gain a clear competitive advantage. The U.S. district court upheld the ABA's position and enjoined the implementation of the FHLBB's regulations.

H.R. 5414 would resolve this unnecessary confusion by expressly allowing financial institutions to offer interest-bearing checking accounts to "individuals and all nonprofit institutions" excluding only commercial entities. It treats banks and S. & L.'s equally and would allow all Government funds to receive interest rather than granting this benefit to isolated State or local functions. Finally, it helps relieve the budgetary pressures crushing States and municipalities by utilizing a simple practical deregulatory mechanism at no cost to the Federal Government. The case is clear and I encourage the support of my colleagues for this initiative.●

EMPLOYMENT SERVICES—SAVING THE PROGRAM

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. TAUKE) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. TAUKE. Mr. Speaker, for weeks now, I have been working with Iowa State officials, officials from the Department of Labor, and my colleagues to try to stem the layoff of 5,000 job placement personnel nationwise. The financial problems of the job placement service are difficult, and as we face a national unemployment level of 9.8 million Americans, it is even more important that we try to keep as many of these people in the labor force as possible and off the ever-expanding unemployment rolls.

During consideration of the third continuing resolution, the funds for the administration of the unemployment insurance and employment services programs were reduced by $264 million to a level of $1.932 billion. This was done with the understanding that the processing of unemployment insurance claims would not be affected during a time of high unemployment across the country. Additionally, it was done with congressional understanding that if the January unemployment figures were higher than the September 1981 predictions, then a request for supplemental funds would be submitted to Congress. By insuring that unemployment benefits would be paid, we necessarily eliminated the distribution of funds to the job placement services, because they are both funded out of the same FUTA account. This problem must be corrected immediately. It makes no sense to cut back the single Federal program which helps the unemployed find work.

Therefore, I commend the Administration and my colleagues for acting quickly to bring up a request for supplemental funding for the unemployment compensation, unemployment insurance, and employment services program. The request will be taken up by the Subcommittee on Labor, Health and Human Services, and Education of the Appropriations Committee later today, and I have all confidence that $210 million will be provided for the maintenance of the job placement account. I commend my colleagues on the speedy action they are taking.

It is unconscionable to allow those who are unemployed to flounder while looking for jobs. During fiscal year 1981, Job Services of Iowa placed 95,666 in jobs at an hourly average wage of $4.50. The taxable income derived from these placements in 1 year is $895,433,760. This program is obviously working and putting money back into the economy. We cannot afford to let it die and then 6 months from now try to resurrect it to meet even greater demands.

However, the problem is more far-reaching than just the supplemental funding for fiscal year 1982. The Employment Services Administration will be facing this same problem each year from now until we change the system. The FUTA account is inelastic—as unemployment rises, the revenue base of the FUTA account decreases proportionately. Our present financing system of 0.7 percent on the first $6,000 earned by each employee is no longer meeting the needs of the employers, employees, or the system. Therefore, I am suggesting that all committees working with this matter take action this year in revising the necessary portions of the Wagner-Peyser Act and working to address the long-term financing problems of a labor exchange.

Again, I am pleased with the response from my colleagues with regard to meeting the needs of the job placement side of the unemployment system. I am confident that we will be able to reemploy at least a major portion of the 5,000 job placement personnel laid off nationwide and a large portion of the 215 people laid off in Iowa.

I believe that we are acting responsibly by providing funding for the rest of this year while we study and amend the system so it can continue to provide services and not drain the economy in the future.●

HEARING ON H.R. 5227, THE EXTRADITION REFORM ACT OF 1981

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. HUGHES) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, I wish to announce that the Subcommittee on Crime, which I chair, of the House Committee on the Judiciary, will hold a second day of hearings on H.R. 5227, the Extradition Reform Act of 1981. The hearing is scheduled for February 3, 1982, in room 2237, Rayburn House Office Building, at 2 p.m. Witnesses will include William Goodman, defense attorney, San Francisco, Calif.; Prof. Cherif Bassiouni, College of Law of DePaul University, Chicago, Ill.; Prof. Steven Lubet, international travel and transnational criminal law, Northwestern University; and other interested parties with a specialized interest in extradition.

Persons wishing to submit statements for the RECORD should contact the Subcommittee on Crime, House Committee on the Judiciary, 207 Cannon House Office Building, Washington, D.C. 20515 or telephone (202) 225-1695.●

PITTSBURGH STANDS WITH SOLIDARITY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. WILLIAM J. COYNE), is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. WILLIAM J. COYNE. Mr. Speaker, according to one of my city's eminent jurists, Judge John G. Brosky, Lech Walesa, the courageous leader of Poland's Solidarity Union, was scheduled to Pittsburgh in October of last year. Unfortunately, events in Poland prevented his appearance.

While Lech Walesa could not represent his movement in person, the people of Pittsburgh, a city proud of its own union tradition, rallied in late December to let the people of Poland know that we stand with them in their struggle.

Judge Brosky was one of the principal speakers at that rally, which I was pleased to attend. His suggestions on actions the United States should take to aid the brave people of Poland, which include the launching of a food airlift similar to the one which aided Berlin in 1949, deserve wider airing.

I would like to share with my colleagues Judge Brosky's thoughtful remarks:

Thank you Mr. Grabowski, Reverend Fathers, distinguished guests, fellow Americans of Polish descent, ladies and gentlemen.

I share in the words of our chairman and express my gratitude for your participation here today. I join with your heads and hearts in this tremendous demonstration of support for the courageous, suffering, freedom loving people of Poland.

We are a collective people of all races, creeds, color and ethnic backgrounds, proud of our differences, but coming together in collective strength to defend those unalienable rights of life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness.

This is the hope of America; this is the hope of Poland; this is the dream of mankind throughout the world.

It was just a few short months ago, this past summer, that I stood here before a similar rally with labor leaders, management of industry, religious leaders and the Polish people of Pittsburgh, alongside of Stanley Walesa, the father of Lech Walesa, that young, dynamic leader of the organized workers of Poland.

It was a warm, sunny day with a clear blue sky above. There was a joy in our hearts, songs on our lips, and dancing in our feet. It was a big, joyous occasion for there was good reason to celebrate the successes of the Polish workers and the freedoms won from the Communists.

This fall, in October, Lech Walesa himself was to visit Pittsburgh and we were preparing to give him the same but greater recognition than that for his father. However, all was not well in Poland.

With continued unrests and frequent strikes being held to protest the economic conditions in Poland, one could sense growing tensions among the leadership of the workers.

Lech Walesa was the stabilizing force in Poland. A strong leader of the organized workers who called themselves the "Solidarnosc" or Solidarity Union, he was a bold, courageous, intelligent, cool-headed, young man of stateman like quality. He had the respect of the Communist government and effectively achieved goals demanded of his people.

He made a tremendous impact on the world for his successful stand for human rights. Time magazine chose Lech Walesa as their "Man of the Year" for 1981. He is truly deserving of this honor. We applaud their decision.

Throughout the 1,000 year history of Poland, the spirit of the Polish people has remained invincible. Polish soldiers fought both in Poland and on foreign soil with great casualties for one goal—it was always "for your freedom and ours."

The people of Poland are deeply religious, nationalistic and strong individuals. They are not Communists and will never be Communists.

Poland's long desire for freedom was best expressed in a poem entitled, "The Caged Birds," by a celebrated Polish writer, which sums it all in this verse:

A curious, young greenfinch asked an old bird
Why in this cage do you cry?
You have more comforts here than you did in the fields.
I'll forgive you was the old one's reply
For you were born caged, but I used to be free
And now without freedom I'll die.

The "Caged Birds" of Poland, who, first sought their freedom, were the workers in the shipyards of Gdansk in northern Poland on the Baltic Sea and the miners in coal fields of Silesia in southern Poland who began a strike on August 14, 1980 to better their way of life.

The strike which ended peacefully after 18 days with the Polish Communist accepting a 21 point agreement. The concessions granted by the Communists were not only economic benefits to the workers, but there were many political, cultural and religious privileges to improve the quality of life for people generally.

This achievement was a great historical event. It is the first time since communism was established as a state form of government that its fundamental principle of control was set aside.

Whatever concessions, however, were granted to the Poles, the government made one thing clear in its 21 point agreement. That is, workers have the right to form free self-governing trade unions so long as they do not act as political parties or contest the Communist Party supremacy.

Apparently the Soviet Union believed that the workers were challenging the Communist Party control of the government. Consequently, martial law was ordered for the country. The troops moved in as they did on Hungary and Czechoslovakia. Intervention by Soviet military forces is now a growing concern of the Western nations. The holocaust of suffering has begun.

There came instant reactions from around the world. As if their statements were prepared in advance, many countries, like West Germany, announced that martial law in Poland is an internal affair and that any attempt to deprive the Soviets of their control of Poland might jeopardize peace.

Meantime, these countries closed their ears to the violence, killings, suffering, beatings, arrests and tortures inflicted on thousands of Polish people through martial law.

Only the United States responded in a positive manner. We commend our President for this. Although he had several options, he chose in the first instance to impose economic sanctions strictly against Poland. This denies the Polish people the necessities of life, which can only compound the hardships already imposed by martial law. Our suggestions are as follows:

Number one: The President indicated he doesn't want to hurt the Polish people. Then the answer should be to begin an airlift to Poland similar to that of the Berlin Airlift a few years back. Let's empty our granaries and warehouses stacked with cheese and agricultural products which one Senator said should be dumped into the sea.

The human and decent course to follow is to establish an airlift for food and medicines through a neutral country or an agency of the United Nations through whom supplies can be forwarded and distributed directly to the people of Poland.

Whatever happens to Poland will affect the whole East-West relationship.

Poland is not solely a United States problem. It's an international matter of serious and great consequence.

Number two: We suggest that the United States immediately place the Poland issue before the United Nations, or, in the alternative, the President should summon a conference of all the leaders of the Western countries including Australia, Canada, New Zealand and Japan to discuss actions to be taken on the crisis in Poland.

Number three: We suggest economic sanctions against the Soviet Union and all Eastern European Communist satellites. An embargo can be effective only when the United States and the countries in the Western Alliance join in such a venture to impose a total restriction on all trade—agricultural, technological, financial or whatever.

Number Four: We ask all Americans to extend their goodwill across the ocean to the freedom loving people of Poland. They need medical supplies, agricultural food and clothing which will be accepted by the Polish Communist government. Each of us can help in his own way.

In addition, write the President, the Senators and Congressmen. Ask them to support Poland in its hour of need. It's the spirit of the season to be moved toward peace, goodwill and mercy for your fellowman.

The Trumpeter of Cracow has sounded his call high above the invaders from the east. He will not be silenced. He must not be silenced. "To win and to relax means disaster; to be defeated and not to surrender, that's victory."—Marshall Pilsudski.

The cause of freedom and victory for Poland and for mankind everywhere is in our hands.

Thank you.●

UNCLOG THE COAL PIPELINE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. WRIGHT) is recognized for 15 minutes.

● Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, last year, more than half of this Nation's electricity was generated by coal. Unfortunately for consumers, most of that coal had only one way to get to its utility markets—by railroad. In fact, coal shipments to electric utilities are more than 80 percent captive to rail. Greater competition in coal transportation is essential if we are going to keep delivered prices reasonable and prevent electricity rates from going higher and higher.

The time now has come—after 20 years of debate—for this Congress to enact legislation granting the right of Federal eminent domain to interstate coal slurry pipelines. Passage of the Staggers Rail Act in the last Congress provided increased pricing flexibility for the railroads, and it is more critical than ever that an alternative transportation system is allowed to be developed to benefit consumers of electricity. A major effort will be undertaken to move a coal pipeline bill through the House and Senate in this session of Congress, and I will be fully supportive of that undertaking.

During the past month, editorials have appeared in the New York Times and the Wall Street Journal solidly supporting Federal eminent domain for coal pipelines. The editorials articulate the compelling arguments for promoting this promising technology, and I commend them to the attention of my colleagues.

The standard way to move coal from mine mouth to power plant is by rail and barge. But it's not the only way. Pulverized and mixed with water, coal "slurry" can be efficiently moved by pipe, for hundreds or even thousands of miles.

Why, then, is there only one coal slurry pipeline in operation? Because the railroads have blocked other pipe construction by refusing to provide rights-of-way across their tracks. Eminent domain legislation, now pending in Congress, would break the rail monopoly and help hold down the cost of generating electricity.

Coal is a key to America's self-sufficiency in energy. It is abundant, cheap to mine and, when burned with care, relatively benign to the environment. Railroads, supplemented by river barges, could probably meet any increase in the demand for coal transport. But without effective competition, the high cost of moving coal by train over long distances is bound to retard the coal revolution. That's where slurry fits in.

Three planned pipelines would move low-sulfur coal from the northern plains to southern cities now dependent on natural gas. One would feed Appalachian coal to power plants in Florida. And three others would serve the export trade, bringing fuel to the ports of Norfolk, Los Angeles and Portland.

The opposition in the plains states comes from farmers and ranchers, who fear competition for scarce but low-priced water. Their complaints have impressed the Reagan Administration, which opposes the pending Federal law on the pretext that interstate energy commerce should be left to the states. But the slurry companies are confident that entrenched water interests can be bought off. The more serious opposition comes from railroads.

Until last year the railroads had a good case. Unsympathetic regulators prevented them from making a profit on most freight; their virtual monopoly in the coal traffic was often the only thing that kept them from bankruptcy. But regulatory reform has now given the railroads the rate flexibility they need to survive. There is every reason to let pipelines begin to compete.

The bills submitted to the House and Senate would still require pipeline developers to make their peace with individual states on water and environmental issues. But they would pre-empt for the Federal Government the authority to require the railroads to sell their rights-of-way for slurry operations.

It is hardly likely that slurry pipelines could grab all the coal traffic. They are likely, however, to cut into railroad profits on coal. And that is how free enterprise is supposed to work.

[From the Wall Street Journal, Jan. 27, 1982]

DAMPENING THE COALS

Coal mining concerns and the railroads are locked in a classic feud pitting the principles of the competitive free market against the protection afforded by government regulation. The issue is whether pipelines should be allowed to compete with the railways for the expanding coal transport market. The Reagan administration, it's sad to say, is moving along the wrong track in this dispute.

The vast bulk of U.S. coal is moved by rail, at no little expense. For instance, railway charges to ship a load of coal from a Wyoming mine to a Texas utility are now about four times the price of the coal itself. Coal producers complain that they are "captive customers" to the railroads and would like to see competition.

One idea, which dates back more than 90 years, is to move coal by pipeline. Coal can be ground and mixed with a liquid—water, oil, methanol or even liquefied carbon dioxide from the coal itself—and the resulting slurry can be pumped through underground pipelines to utilities, industrial users and ships for export. Besides helping to develop our coal reserves, slurry pipelines could also provide direct and indirect savings in transportation costs, according to a 1980 study commissioned by the Energy Department. "To the extent that the threat of slurry pipeline competition acts to keep rail rates low, then savings can result even if coal is hauled by rail," it concludes.

The only coal pipeline now in operation runs from Arizona to Nevada and carries 4.8 million tons a year at a cost estimated at less than half the comparable rail shipment. There are tentative plans for another eight slurry lines, with a total capacity of over 150 million tons annually. However, work on these pipelines is being impeded by two major obstacles: inability to gain rights-of-way across the country's vast web of railway lines and the question of water availability in the West.

The federal government granted eminent domain authority to the railroads in the 1860s and 1870s to allow them to traverse land and thus to facilitate the growth of the West. The railways are blocking the entrance of slurry pipelines into the coal transport market by refusing them rights-of-way across railway property. Similar railway recalcitrance led to federal rights-of-way for petroleum pipelines during World War II and eminent domain authority has also been given to interstate gas pipelines and electric power lines.

The Reagan administration was asked to support legislation in Congress last year to permit coal slurries to cross railway lines. But Interior Secretary James Watt said the administration would not support granting eminent domain authority to the coal pipelines because it would violate states' rights. Mr. Watt's explanation was, in a word, fallacious.

All but one of the planned slurry pipelines would cut across state lines and therefore come under direct federal jurisdiction as interstate commerce. Besides, the only reason the coal producers are in this fix is the federal privileges granted to the railroads in the first place. The responsibility for granting rights-of-way to these slurry lines rests solely and squarely with the federal government, not in the state capitals.

A state's rights issue does arise, however, over the question of water availability. Here the legislation would limit the federal government's authority and would in effect give the governors veto power over coal lines based on water scarcity. This doesn't seem to bother the coal producers much. They figure they can probably find other liquids such as oil to convey the coal through the pipelines.

What really seems to be on the administration's mind is the worry that support of eminent domain for coal pipelines would be perceived in the West as federal infringement in the sensitive area of water rights, even though this is not truly the case. So the administration drew back from the issue by making this false plea for states' rights. In the meantime coal producers must cope with transportation bottlenecks, and the railways are asking the Interstate Commerce Commission to lift price regulations on coal exports. This too has the coal mine companies up in arms.

Congress will soon have a chance to redress the balance. The House Public Works Committee soon will take up the pipeline issue. (The House Interior Committee has already approved the eminent domain legislation.) We hope that Congress shows more concern than the administration for introducing competiton in the coal transport market and thus, it's hoped, encourages further development of our vast coal reserves.

[From the Alabama Journal, Jan. 6, 1982]

UP WITH COAL

The Tennessee Valley Authority reportedly has come to the realization that coal will be the least costly way to fuel its electrical generating plants. This comes from a utility that has committed itself to the atomic trail almost as though it had been divinely ordained.

It did so despite the proven perils that must be dealt with to make such facilities accident proof. It also made its decision for nuclear power although its territory—in Tennessee, Alabama and Kentucky—covers some of the richest and most available coal deposits in the nation.

Now, according to a news story, TVA must decide what to do to make the switch. The story said the options include halting construction of nuclear plants and building those that operate off coal.

Critics have long clawed away at the nuclear industry over its lush claims. The atom was supposed to be a good genie that would be a wondrous handmaiden, bounteously serving up electricity that would be clean, safe and inexpensive. Its disciples at the outset even chortled it would be so cheap that there would be no need to meter it.

But buried in all their gabble was the government's vast spending on research and development. Also glossed over were the lapses in technology, design, maintenance and operation that could flare to the surface with the potential for releasing virulent radioactivity.

The public started to get restless when TVA's Browns Ferry plant near Athens, Ala. had a fire which almost got out of control. Then there was the near-catastrophe at Three Mile Island in Pennsylvania that will cost as much as $1 billion to correct.

Coal is no perfect alternative. It gives off toxic substances when burned. But they can be contained, as research by the United States and other industrial countries has demonstrated, without being prohibitively expensive.

So, finally, it appears TVA is ready to kick its addiction to nuclear power. Such a switch could mean that Americans will now fully know the atomic genie for the unnecessary, treacherous imp that it is.●

WHY YET ANOTHER SOCIAL SECURITY COMMISSION?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. REUSS), is recognized for 10 minutes.

● Mr. REUSS. Mr. Speaker, study commissions are all too often devices for political face saving. While some produce useful, scholarly research, many commissions are simply a way to defuse a controversial issue—to buy time rather than shed any light.

The new National Commission on Social Security Reform, established by Executive order last December, is a perfect example of this tactic. In September, when a barrage of criticism forced President Reagan to withdraw his proposals for cutbacks in social security benefits, he called for a task force to "propose realistic long-term reforms to put social security back on a sound financial footing." The 15-member Commission, headed by Alan Greenspan, includes Lane Kirkland, former Social Security Commissioner Robert Ball, four Senators, three Congressmen, two former Members of Congress, and three business executives. This group, the President said, is needed to "forge a working, bipartisan consensus so that the necessary reforms will be passed into law."

Since 1977, when congress tackled the financial problems of the social security system by approving substantial increases in payroll taxes, there has been no shortage of studies on the subject. Three studies were mandated by the 1977 law, including a National Commission on Social Security, a separate study of the universal coverage issue, and a report on the treatment of women under social security. The National Commission issued its report in 1981. So did the President's Commission on Pension Policy, which devoted considerable space to social security issues. And the Social Security Advisory Council, which is required by the basic social security statute to report every 4 years, was last heard from in 1979. Once this body has been reconstituted, its next report is due in 1983.

Despite all this work, much misinformation still exists on social security's financial problems. Unfortunately, public fears about the system's solvency have been exploited by the administration in its attempts to advance its proposals for cutbacks. And press accounts that talk in terms of the system "going broke" have added to the confusion.

The short-term problems, in fact, are the direct result of poor economic performance. The high rates of inflation and unemployment in recent years have caused operating deficits by simultaneously pushing up the costs of social security benefits and reducing payroll tax receipts. These shortfalls have drained the system's reserves. But the trust funds are not on the verge of bankruptcy. Unless the economy collapses—which the administration certainly isn't predicting—the short-term strains on social security should be manageable without radical changes in either benefit levels or taxes.

There are serious, long-term problems with social security, caused by demographic factors. When the postwar baby boom reaches retirement age, beginning about three decades from now, its support will depend on less numerous working age people. Changes in social security programs will be needed, but we have plenty of time to examine the options and phase in whatever solutions we decide upon.

Rather than waiting to hear from yet another extensive commission, the administration and the Congress would be far better advised to review the large body of work we already have. The 400-page report of the 1981 Commission, for example, is thorough, policy oriented, and replete with specific recommendations. Many of them, including proposals for gradually raising the social security retirement age, and shifting part of the costs of medicare to general revenues, are controversial, but it is unlikely that a new report will produce a vastly different set of alternatives.

In any event, the administration has already made clear that it is not really looking for new answers. Its Commissioner of Social Security, John A. Svahn, told the Associated Press in December that regardless of what the new National Commission comes up with, the Reagan administration will steadfastly oppose efforts to use general revenues to finance any part of social security. The administration, though it may try to package the proposals differently next time, is obviously committed to benefit cuts as the solution to social security's problems.

So what is the point of the new National Commission?

[From the Sheboygan (Wis.) Press, Jan. 6, 1982]

WHY, MR. PRESIDENT?

It was less than 10 months ago that the National Commission of Social Security issued a provocative 414-page report—the result of an intensive two-year study—calling for specific measures to rescue the ailing Social Security system.

At that time, we urged President Reagan and the Congress to give the report the consideration it deserved to maintain one of the nation's best programs of social insurance and, at the same time, to shore up eroding public confidence in the system.

Today, it appears that the report—a monumental effort by an independent, bi-partisan, prestigious commission established by a statute passed by Congress—has been totally ignored, and that the study group's two years of labor has been a complete waste of not only time and effort but $2.5 million of the taxpayers money.

The Reagan administration is now proposing creation of a brand new Social Security Reform Panel with the same old assignment: another study to improve and reform the Social Security system.

The public is entitled to know what Mr. Reagan thinks a new study group will do that has not been done before. It is entitled to know why the recent report of the National Commission has been ignored. It is entitled to know why he proposed to go through the whole process again at considerable additional cost to the taxpayer.

Frankly, we would look upon any new study by a group appointed by President Reagan with genuine alarm and suspicion.

Just a few years ago, it was Mr. Reagan who teamed up with Barry Goldwater in a scheme to make Social Security "voluntary"—a scheme that all experts agreed would have undermined the actuarial and financial stability of the system. During the 1980 presidential campaign it was Mr. Reagan who assured us that the integrity of the Social Security system would be preserved, but once safely in office he cynically broke his promise and took steps to weaken the system under guise of budget cutting. He retreated only when the polls showed that the American people were outraged over what they viewed as an attempt to cripple—if not to dismantle—the whole Social Security program.

The nine-member National Commission on Social Security—the group on which James J. Dillman, a Sheboygan attorney, served as vice chairman—offered specific recommendations last March to solve Social Security's short-range financial problems.

While not everyone will agree with all of the Commission's recommendations, its research and field hearings work and its factual findings should provide an excellent basis for charting the future of Social Security. There can be absolutely no justification for Mr. Reagan's suggestion to go back to square one with another study of the very same sort.

Over the years, eight presidents and 22 Congresses have made solemn promises to the American people that their government, acting as trustees for those who have built up rights under Social Security, will meet its obligations as they fall due.

Now is not the time for President Reagan to be proposing yet another Social Security study—an insensitive maneuver which will only further delay urgently needed reforms in the system. It is time for the president to offer the reassurance that his administration intends to fully carry out its compact with Social Security's contributing workers and beneficiaries.●

GENERAL DOZIER'S RESCUE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. MINISH) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. MINISH. Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to be able to stand before you this morning and congratulate the Italian police for their most courageous and daring rescue of Brig. Gen. James Dozier. After 42 days of captivity, when our concern for the general's safety may have been greater than we wanted to voice, it is a blessing and a tribute to the free world that General Dozier has been returned unharmed to his wife, family, and to all Americans who were sympathetic to his plight.

Certainly this rescue mission says a great deal for the competence and bravery of the Italian policemen who stormed the apartment in Padua where General Dozier was held captive by the Red Brigade. The Italian police exhibited great skill during a critical operation which lasted only a few moments. However, as an American of Italian descent, I also took great pride in another aspect of the rescue mission.

I was impressed by the regard for human life which the Italian police displayed. No shots were fired in that mission and only one person was injured enough to be taken to the hospital. This is true despite the fact that when the police found General Dozier, he was being guarded by an armed terrorist. With lightning quick reflexes, an Italian policeman struck the Red Brigade member with the butt of his gun, avoiding having to shoot him, but also making certain that the general's life was saved. I think that maneuver displayed a split-second intelligence and compassion in what is obviously one of the most difficult decisions anyone would have to make in his lifetime.

This rescue effort is also important because it revealed the Italian police's ability to detect the movements and thwart the unscrupulous actions of the Red Brigade. According to reports in the New York Times, there is considerable factionalism within the Red Brigade and a breakdown of the organization. This mission strikes another blow to the terrorist group.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that this mission should send a signal to those who believe that terrorism is an acceptable means to their political end. It is not. This rescue effort is a sign to all who cherish human freedom and dignity, that we will not tolerate terrorist actions. It is my prayer that the United States and our allies will continue to work together so that officials living abroad will not have to fear for their safety. Finally, on this happy day, I send my blessing and sincere good wishes to the Dozier family who exhibited tremendous strength and spirit during the ordeal.●

INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION REGARDING THE OSAGE NATION OF INDIANS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, today I have introduced two bills which propose to establish the modern-day membership of the Osage Tribe of Oklahoma. The bills will allow the tribe to reorganize their government and establish the criteria for future tribal membership. These bills are being introduced by request to get this matter before the Congress where it rightfully belongs.

The problems of membership, voting rights, and tribal government date back to the passage of the Osage Allotment Act of 1906 which closed the membership rolls; alloted Osage lands and divided the mineral estate among the then 2,229 members. Because of this act only those who inherited an interest in the mineral estate—known as a headright owner—may vote in tribal elections and hold office. In modern terms, the vast majority of the Osage people—who today number 10,443 people—cannot vote in tribal elections and may never become tribal members irregardless of their tribal blood quantum.

The Osage Nation Organization representing persons of one-quarter or more degree Osage blood have been in court since 1973 to resolve the issue of tribal government and representation. In 1980 they were told that these are problems created by Congress which can only be resolved by Congress. Clearly there is a need for the Congress to act to protect and preserve the integrity of the tribe.

The Osage Indians are in a unique situation and one which Congress and the courts have generally not condoned. First, their membership was defined for them in the 1906 act. Second, the tribal government was abolished by law and was replaced by a form of government more akin to a mineral corporation than a tribal government. Third, the electorate are more akin to shareholders than constituents. In fact, they must have a share in the mineral estate to vote and their vote is proportionate to their share. And finally, anyone whose name is not on the 1906 roll, or who has not inherited a headright, cannot vote for the tribal council. This applies to some 8,000 persons on the quarterly annuity roll held in Osage Agency, Okla.

There is no further court action which can be taken to successfully rectify this situation to the satisfaction of all parties. There is no administrative action which can be taken based on present law. A legislative solution is the only avenue left. For these reasons, I have today introduced two bills to place the future of the Osage Nation of Indians in the hands of the Osage people. In keeping with historical practice; court decisions; and in recognition of the sovereignty of Indian governments and their inherent right to determine their own membership, I place this matter before the Congress. I had intended to introduce three bills to ensure that all interested parties would have their position before us. However, the Osage tribal council last week withdrew their bill which they had wished to introduce last May.

The Osage Indians were, aboriginally, located on the lower Ohio River and the lower Mississippi. In historical times, this tribe occupied large tracts of land in what are now the States of Missouri, Arkansas, Kansas, and Oklahoma. Through a series of land cession treaties with the United States, beginning in 1808 and ending in 1865, the tribe lost most of this land and was pushed back to a reservation in north-central Oklahoma.

From 1866 until 1881, the Osage Tribe resided on this reservation and governed its affairs under its traditional form of government. In 1881, the tribe adopted a constitution which established a three-branch government patterned after the American model. The tribe functioned under this form of government until 1900, when the Secretary of the Interior illegally abolished the government.

In 1906, Congress passed legislation which abolished the tribal form of government and rigidly defined membership without making allowances for future membership and representative government. The present state of affairs is the direct result of this 1906 act.●

SENATE—Tuesday, February 2, 1982

(Legislative day of Monday, January 25, 1982)

The Senate met at 11 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the Vice President.

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, LL.D., D.D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father which art in Heaven, many of us learned in childhood the prayer that the Lord Jesus taught. We heard it often from the lips of our parents as we were with them in the church. We pray it every time we attend public worship. Forgive us Lord for thoughtless mouthing of words which have become meaningless by their redundance. Forgive us for the familiarity that breeds contempt, even for that which is sacred.

Help us to understand why Christ would teach such a prayer. Help us to understand the essential wisdom in its petitions. Help us to perceive its relevance for our daily situation, to realize how it comprehends our basic human need.

Our Father, which art in heaven, Hallowed be Thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven.—Matthew 6: 9-10.

Grant us to understand that the deepest longings of the heart in their totality are fulfilled in the glory of Thy name, the coming of Thy kingdom, and the doing of Thy will on Earth as it is in Heaven. Could we legislate these three conditions it would be to the profoundest satisfaction of all humanity. May we mean it when we say it, and seek it with all our hearts. In Jesus' name. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the previous order, the majority leader is recognized.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I thank the Chair.

THE JOURNAL

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Journal of the proceedings of the Senate be approved to date.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I may say that I am delighted to see the distinguished President of the Senate, the Vice President of the United States, here safe, hale, and hearty, in view of the press accounts that I heard this morning when I first arose. We are always pleased to have the Vice President here, but we are especially pleased to have him here today.

THINGS MEN HAVE MADE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, the second session is now with us, and so is D. H. Lawrence and his poem "Things Men Have Made."

Things men have made with wakened hands, and put soft life into are awake through years with transferred touch, and go on glowing for long years.

And for this reason, some old things are lovely warm still with the life of forgotten men who made them.

ORDER FOR ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, after the recognition of the two leaders under the standing order and the special orders entered for today, there be a brief period for the transaction of routine morning business to extend not longer than 20 minutes in length in which Senators may speak for not more than 5 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ABDNOR). Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE SENATE SCHEDULE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I may say that it is my intentions, after the Senate resumes its regular schedule of activities after the period for transaction of routine morning business, to ask this body to turn to the consideration of Senate Resolution 20, which is the resolution authorizing live television coverage of the Senate. I have consulted with the distinguished minority leader in advance on this subject on more than one occasion and with the distinguished Senator from Louisiana (Mr. LONG), who has expressed a great interest in this subject, as well.

I may say that I would expect the Senate to be engaged in this debate as long as necessary today and this week. It may be, Mr. President, that if the debate extends past today it would be desirable for the Senate to consider the possibility of double-tracking in order to take up other matters, as well as Senate Resolution 20, such matters as the consideration of the Criminal Code provision which is on the calendar.

Other matters that suggest themselves as possible candidates for double-tracking would include the agent identities bill, regulatory reform, the death penalty, and other matters that may be suggested by Senators.

This recitation is not intended to be an exclusive list nor a request for clearance to do these items or any item in a double-track situation by unanimous consent, but rather to put Senators on notice that after today it may be desirable to consider double-tracking and perhaps later today the Senate might consider a unanimous-consent request authorizing that, if necessary.

Mr. President, I have already indicated, in my most preliminary remarks, that I am pleased, as I am sure every Member of this body is pleased, to see the Vice President of the United States, the President of the Senate, here in good health and in good spirit. I do not know anything more of the news reports this morning about the possibility of some projectile striking the Vice President's motorcade as it proceeded from his home to the White House this morning. I will talk to the Vice President about that later in the day and perhaps he can give us more information about it and if that is possible and desirable I will pass it on to the Senate in a later statement.

REMARKS OF TENNESSEE GOVERNOR ALEXANDER ON NEW FEDERALISM

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of remarks made by Gov. Lamar Alexander of Tennessee on President Reagan's call for a new federalism be placed in the RECORD.

Governor Alexander gave an astute and spirited explanation of the bold action taken by President Reagan, and I am sure that my colleagues on both sides of the aisle will find it informative.

There being no objection, the remarks were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REMARKS OF GOVERNOR ALEXANDER

President Reagan's "New Federalism Bombshell" hit Washington Tuesday.

If it ever hits Main Street, the changes will make more difference to the ability of Americans to control everyday community decisions than anything Congress has done in half a century.

First, the President proposed a Grand Swap: The Federal Government will take over medicaid; in return, the states will take over all of Food Stamps and Aid to Families with Dependent Children. In addition, the Federal Government will return back to state control all or most of the Federal interest in 40 education, transportation, community development and social service programs. The money to pay for these programs will come back with the programs. To avoid dislocation, the whole plan will be phased in over 8 years.

The proposal is big. It is complex. Since it will dominate Washington talk this year, here is a handy guide to the issues:

Some false issues you are likely to hear:

(1) "Our state will be a big financial loser in the swap of Federal programs." That cannot be true, at least as the President has proposed it.

It is true that any new structuring of more than 40 Federal programs involving $50 billion will affect States in very different ways. For example, in the swap—Tennessee loses $224 million a year, Florida loses $455 million, but California, New York, and Minnesota come out ahead.

But finding a fair, reliable and permanent way to keep any State from being a significant financial loser is part of the President's plan.

(2) "You can't trust the States."

In the 1930's, according to Dr. Gallup, Americans by large margins believed that the Federal Government had the least corruption and the best managers. Today, Gallup surveys show that Americans by nearly two-to-one margins trust State governments more than the Federal Government. States are guilty of some neglect in the past. Some things they neglected to do were better not done. States don't run up trillion-dollar deficits, or for that matter, any deficits.

Times have changed. Legislatures have been reapportioned. Civil rights laws—especially the Voting Rights Act—are secure. Today, the same people elect everyone.

You shouldn't buy this argument unless you believe that the further away someone gets from any ineffective third grade classroom, a leaky sewer or a pothole, the better he will understand it and the more likely he is to fix it.

(3) "The President's proposals are hastily conceived, ill-prepared, and incomplete."

That is wrong. The President's revolutionary proposal is based on four old concepts that, if anything, have suffered from too much thinking through: Revenue sharing, bloc grants, tax and responsibility turnbacks, and the Grand Swap. The Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations can produce 10 thick volumes on each concept and within days report specifically on the impact of any new variation.

Governors, State legislators, mayors and county executives have recently focused their attention almost exclusively on the need to restructure the Federal system. Influential members of Congress, especially in the budget and Government operations committees, have developed similar specific options for reordering the Federal system that Congress could accept right now.

(4) "Reagan's idea is too big, too complex and too revolutionary ever to pass Congress."

The people who say this are as reliable as those who said: (a) Reagan will never be elected; (b) Congress will never cut taxes; (c) Congress will never index taxes; (d) Reagan will never agree to take over medicaid.

There is bi-partisan support. "New Federalism" is a Republican article of faith. Howard Baker, the Senate majority leader, made his maiden address to the U.S. Senate in the spring of 1967 on the need for revenue sharing. Democratic Governors like George Busbee of Georgia, Scott Matheson of Utah; and Bruce Babbitt of Arizona are at the front of the crusade.

Finally, Congress has little else to do this year that it can write home about. On its agenda are: Raising taxes that hurt people, chopping programs that help people, debating social issues that make people mad. Singing power to the people can help drown out some election year miseries.

Here are some real issues:

(1) Should the States take food stamps and AFDC in the Grand Swap?

There should not be much disagreement with the President's idea to federalize medicaid. The Feds already have medicare, a bigger program that does the same thing: Pay medical bills for people who need help. Management by one level of Government should help control exploding costs. All of Government medical support should be part of the social safety net.

The other half of the Swap—what the States take in return—will be the largest issue. The President says the States should take the food stamp program—almost all Federal now—and aid to families with dependent children, about 60 percent Federal.

It is not hard to know why the President thinks this. In California he restructured welfare, reduced its costs and focused the money on those who needed it the most. After watching two huge different Federal bureaucracies struggle to administer the programs, he must be even more confident that States can do a better job.

The problem with his proposal, most Governors would respectfully suggest, is that while it may be good for one rich State or even a federation of rich States, America has instead 50 States whose people have widely different incomes and capacity to provide for their needs. Alaska is so rich with natural resources that the State government has declared dividends. Mississippians are so poor that in many counties Federal transfer payments are the principal source of income for the people.

In addition to providing for the national defense and a sound currency, Congress should make a national decision about how much money we take from those who earn it to give to those who need help. This would avoid wide variances among the States. Management by one level of Government would help control costs.

Then, what will the States take back in the swap? Governors might suggest this dollar-for-dollar swap: The Federal Government takes over all income distribution programs; the States take back more programs that focus on everyday local concerns, such as elementary and secondary education, roads and bridges, economic development, community development and job training.

This is a real issue but not necessarily a real impasse. The Governors respect the President for understanding and talking about the issue that they care the most about. His recommendation to federalize medicaid is a substantial concession to the Governors' philosophical position. His invitation to consult is welcome. As a result, the response of State and local officials will hopefully be that the President has laid out a framework apt to produce a furious discussion but a good result.

(2) Can a permanent and reliable way be found to keep poor States from being big losers in the grand swap?

The object should not be to hold States harmless. Rather, the goal should be to define what the national response should be toward having both Alaskas and Mississippi in the United States. The problem can be solved for the short term by freezing existing distribution formulas. Congress is accustomed to recognizing financial differences among States: Some States pay only 30 percent of medicaid and AFDC; richer States pay half.

One idea for the long term: Create a special revenue sharing fund financed by a new permanent tax. The tax could be on imported oil. Dollars would go to the States based on that need. This is a familiar part of the revenue sharing formula which distributes its money based on population, per capita income and tax effort. The Advisory Committee on Intergovernmental Relations has a new and probably better device which measures each State's taxing capacity.

(3) What will happen to the Federal aid that goes directly to cities and counties?

For at least the past 15 years, cities and counties have enjoyed going to Washington for what most local officials found to be a deeper pocket and a more sensitive welcome than they received from State legislators at home. Relinquishing that deep pocket is a source of great concern, especially to larger urban areas. The President's proposal seeks to address that by requiring 15 to 25 percent of the super revenue sharing trust fund to be "passed through" to local governments.

A more fundamental answer to the problem is that Federal Government with a trillion dollar deficit is not likely to have so much of a deep pocket in the 1980's. In addition, after reapportionment there is no reason why large urban areas in most States should be inadequately represented in their general assemblies.

(4) Are the President's proposed tax turnbacks real?

Using the phasing out of the windfall profit tax as one of the turned back taxes is stretching it a bit. For this proposal, the President needs specific taxes that may be turned back in exact fashion.

(5) Can anybody talk about this issue in a way that doesn't put people to sleep?

The President can. Most Taxpayers can. Most politicians have never learned how.

Do you think it is a good idea for a Department of Education in Washington to spend its time setting the dress code, or the length of hair or the ratio of boys to girls in choirs in your neighborhood school? Is it wise for a small town mayor's first response to a leaky sewer to be a trip to Washington? Must every rural bridge be replaced by an engineering marvel built to national standards?

I walked across Tennessee for 6 months in 1978, staying in homes with more than 80 families. I found out quickly that most families tune out Washington talk. Most families are concerned first about everyday decisions: Is the school good? Is the water safe and the sewer adequate? Is the road fixed and free from crime? When does the garbage get picked up?

They are frustrated over their increasing inability to control these most important decisions in their lives. The reason they can't control them is because Washington has stuck its decision-making nose too far under the local tent. As a result, some of these citizens have quit voting.

There is nothing about solving that problem that will put most Americans to sleep.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have no further need for my time under the standing order. I see no Senator on this side seeking recognition for the purpose of asking me to yield to them the time remaining under the standing order. I am prepared now to yield my remaining time to the distinguished minority leader for his use or to yield it back as he may prefer.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, if the majority leader will yield me the remaining time.

Mr. BAKER. Yes. Mr. President, I yield my time remaining under the standing order to the minority leader.

RECOGNITION OF THE MINORITY LEADER

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The minority leader is recognized.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the majority leader.

Mr. President, may I ask the distinguished majority leader if he plans to recess from 12 noon until, say 2 p.m. today?

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I had not planned a recess, but I am agreeable to that. Today is Tuesday. Could I inquire of the minority leader if there is a plan for a meeting or a caucus on his side of the aisle, as there is on this side of the aisle, between that period?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes, there is.

ORDER FOR RECESS FROM 12 NOON UNTIL 2 P.M. TODAY

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, in view of that, I believe the business of the Senate might be expedited if, indeed, the Senate stood in recess during the period from 12 o'clock until 2 o'clock so that Members on both sides of the aisle may attend party caucuses. It has been my experience that those caucuses, more often than not, produce a better view of the schedule and of the issues to be debated than were we to stay here and debate in that timeframe.

In view of that, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at the hour of 12 o'clock, without further motion, the Chair put the Senate in recess until the hour of 2 o'clock, at which time the Chair will reconvene the Senate automatically.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. President, I yield to the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin such time as he may require of the time that is under my control.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I thank my distinguished leader.

THE ALL VOLUNTEER FORCE IS WORKING

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, as our Nation puts more enforcement authority behind the unpopular and unnecessary draft registration process, it is ironic that many myths about our country's Volunteer Army are being shattered at the same time.

The public has heard them all—the Volunteer Army is too uneducated, too black and too poor.

A closer look, however, reveals quite a different picture.

An article which appears in the February 1, 1982 edition of Newsweek magazine is a case in point. It was written by Thomas Doherty, an employee at a center for the developmentally disabled in Madison, Wis., and appeared in the magazine's My Turn column.

Here are some excerpts from that column:

The soldiers I came into contact with—white and black, enlisted and commissioned—refused to live down to their advance notices. They did not expect the Army to be comfortable, did not go to pieces when they had to put in what the civilian world calls "overtime." (They were always on the job, except when sleeping, and no one did much of that.)

As for that distasteful illusion that the Army is full of unskilled blacks, here is what Mr. Doherty has to say:

Heard how racial minorities cluster in low-skilled jobs? In the medical company I visited, most of the skilled specialists—operating-room assistant, pharmacist, dental technician—were black, while the cook and two of his three assistants were white.

All in all, this article should provide an insightful look at the Volunteer Army for critics and supporters alike.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the My Turn column in the February 1, 1982, issue of Newsweek, by Thomas Doherty be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the column was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Newsweek, Feb. 1, 1982]

DON'T SELL THE ARMY SHORT

(By Thomas Doherty)

There is a story by Donald Barthelme about a man of 35 who was sent back to sixth grade. He had made too many mistakes in life and so had to be re-educated.

I felt a particular kinship with that man late in October as I stood a predawn guard rotation in the wilds of Florida's Eglin Air Force Base. I am a family man in early middle age, honorably discharged over a decade ago, with no outstanding parking tickets. Yet there I shivered, cradling a rifle loaded with blanks, while just over the hill marauding infantrymen from some hotshot mechanized outfit cut a swath through our lines. Unlike the man in the story, I was there voluntarily, if not exactly by choice. Normally our National Guard unit spends summer camp in garrison, but for a change of pace we had been sent to this war exercise, which was called "Bold Eagle."

The woods were filled with the roar of diesels, with explosions and machine-gun fire, but, most impressively, with the bellowing of eager young soldiers who seemed to like what they were doing. Or at least to take it seriously.

"Don't they know they're supposed to go into acute withdrawal when deprived of their boom boxes, cheeseburgers and spit-shined Camaros?" I thought. "Strung out, all thumbs, too dumb to get out of the rain . . . Don't they know they are not supposed to give a damn?" Those guys not only seemed to know what they were doing, they were downright enthusiastic about it—even at 3 a.m.

WARRIORS

Such reflections brought scant comfort then but have brought much since. Like everyone else, I get my impressions of the Army from the media. But those two weeks revealed a very different Army from the one I have read about and seen on television. To be sure, these were not the superachievers of the 30-second hard sells on television, the confident warriors who do great things each day before the rest of us are at work. But neither were they the culturally stunted mercenaries that the sociologists have been warning us about since the end of the draft. Nor did they fit the dope-head image that haunts newspaper accounts of falling scores and space-age equipment manned by dropouts.

The soliders I came in contact with—white and black, enlisted and commissioned—refused to live down to their advance notices. They did not expect the Army to be comfortable, did not go to pieces when they had to put in what the civilian world calls "overtime." (They were always on the job, except when sleeping, and no one did much of that.)

Most of their equipment was the standard stuff of World War II battlefields, updated but unchanged in essentials: rifles and tanks; field stoves, typewriters and radios. As near as I could tell, the overriding concern of the men and women who operated those machines was not more money or cheaper highs but doing their jobs right. If they didn't, they would hear about it from the next guy, from the sergeant and the commanding officer. Such pressure is as effective now as it was 40 years ago.

And while I'm at it, they were polite to each other. They seemed to like working together. They tolerated indecision, bad weather, boredom, hard work and risk without dissolving into bitterness. They seemed, in fact, to be doing just fine.

Nor does this apply only to full-time line troops. The command section of the Georgia National Guard's 48th Mechanized Infantry came for an extra ten days of training attracted by the prospect of mock combat between the division they are part of—the 24th and the 101st Airmobile Division. Tennessee's Guard brigade was also in the field with the 24th. For most, there were no trips to town. No beer. They ate C rations, slept in pup tents or under shelter halves tied to trees. Half the time they were soaked to the skin. Chances are, when they all got home their neighbors asked about the beaches and night life.

Heard how impersonal the Army can be? One morning a jeep sped by, U-turned and roared back. For me. If you were walking near traffic, sooner or later you got a lift.

Heard how racial minorities cluster in low-skilled jobs? In the medical company I visited, most of the skilled specialists—operating-room assistant, pharmacist, dental technician—were black, while the cook and two of his three assistants were white.

OPENING ROUND

The day before "war" was to start I was sent to take pictures of an armor unit.

Nobody knew me there and each side was scouting the other. It fell to a series of lieutenants to check me out, because spying and thwarting spies were both part of the game. In the circumstances, you might expect the good manners to fade. But no, the first man offered a ride to brigade headquarters, where the second ran another futile clearance check. Then he explained in detail why I would not be allowed in. These men were working for senior officers whose lists of tasks were long, their deadlines short. Even when war is just a game, things get tense before the opening round. In their place I might have said, "Your problem, pal. Get lost."

Good manners do not necessarily make good soldiers, nor does competence in war games assure that an outfit is battle ready. In 1942 U.S. infantrymen regaled Aussie veterans of Greece and North Africa with tales of the Louisiana maneuvers. Later, after they came dragging out of combat in Papua, diseased and much reduced in numbers, little was heard of Louisiana.

But you have to feel good when you run across high-quality people in the Army, and I ran across a lot of them. I met three lieutenants who were approaching the inevitable decision: to get out now or make it a career. For them the Army is no refuge from the real world. They thought themselves equal to any number of challenges, and they are right. In part because of those years in uniform they have more to choose from than most young men. It is no wonder that many are drawn away.

We hear a lot about good people leaving the Army. But it is a comfort to consider the corollary: many good people choose the Army in the first place, and some will stick with it.

BELOIT COLLEGE'S IMAGINATIVE APPROACH FOR INCREASED PRIVATE FUNDING

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, in the June 8 edition of the Wall Street Journal, President Rodger H. Hull of Beloit College outlined his interesting and imaginative approach for increasing the private funding for student aid programs.

While Mr. Hull's plan may or may not be the answer to raising new sources of funds for higher education, his ingenious ideas should be carefully studied. With Federal funds less abundant, colleges and universities must turn to new private initiatives such as the "Beloit Plan."

I ask unanimous consent that the article, "One College's Plan to Boost Financial Support," be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ONE COLLEGE'S PLAN TO BOOST FINANCIAL SUPPORT

(By Roger H. Hull)

Over the last five years, first as vice president for development of a private university and now as president of Beloit College, I have criss-crossed the country in search of funds. I'm used to asking for money—and I even enjoy doing it—although these days it's not quite as enjoyable as it used to be.

With the enactment of the 1981 tax act, President Reagan made an eloquent plea for a renewed spirit of voluntarism. An important element of his rationale for tax cuts was that the private sector should be the source of support for colleges that had previously fed at the public trough.

Like all Americans, those of us in education hope he succeeds. We need more voluntary support; we realize that it is to everyone's advantage if that support materializes.

But if my corporate visits in the last few weeks are any indication, "It ain't necessarily so." The corporate trough is not expanding; the numbers feeding at it are. This means that even colleges like Beloit, which have never relied upon the federal government for much support, may also be hurt. A constant pool of dollars from which to draw will translate into reduced actual support—a particularly ironic result given the ideological commitment to private institutions that underlies both the President's policies and many corporate giving programs.

For instance, when speaking to the chairman of a major corporation (which incidentally is already a 5% contributor), I asked if there was any intent to extend the program, as is now legally permissible, to 10% of pretax earnings. His perfectly legitimate response was that other corporations should first contribute 5%.

A second call was perhaps even more instructive. In this case, I asked when the corporation would begin making increased contributions. The answer: "You should know better. We have no intention of adding a dollar to our contributions budget." At 1% of its pre-tax earnings, the company—it was claimed—was doing all that it should.

Since the reality of voluntarism will be increasingly scrutinized, the challenge is to develop creative responses. Rather than lament the present situation, we must be more imaginative.

We at Beloit are pursuing two approaches: cancellable loans and moral obligation scholarships. Both are designed to deal with federal cutbacks and with a system of financing that seems to encourage students to declare bankruptcy as their first "responsible" act upon graduation.

Under the cancellable loan program, corporate donations would create a revolving loan fund. A corporation would make gifts to the college to help pay off outstanding student loans of corporate employes. Such gifts could be made as an inducement of employment or after a period of satisfactory performance by the employe, or they could be used to recognize outstanding performance. The funds contributed, which would once again be used for loans to other students, would give the corporate donors both the added benefit of a visible employe incentive and a means of measuring (and rewarding) suppliers of corporate talent.

Like cancellable loans, moral obligation scholarships provide money that students need "up front"; unlike loans, they carry a moral, but not legal, repayment commitment. All students in receipt of moral obligation scholarships would receive special counseling and be informed that the scholarships are intended as a revolving fund for future students.

While there would be no legal obligation to repay, there would be a moral obligation to do so—and the college would assist by developing, along the lines of existing loan programs, gift repayment schedules and measures of the real cost of the scholarship over time. Significantly, instead of repaying loans, students would be making tax-deductible gifts. The program, we believe, will lead to a revolving fund which eventually will be larger than what was put in by the initial donors, since scholarship recipients will probably continue giving long after they have paid their moral debt.

Both these programs are of clear benefit to colleges; both are also a real benefit to prospective donors. In such a manner, colleges could capture the imagination of donors and prompt the beneficiaries of President Reagan's tax program to respond positively to his plea for expanded private sector initiatives.

ANTISEMITISM IN POLAND TODAY: A REMINDER OF GERMAN GENOCIDE

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, anti-Semitism is once again displaying its wretched face in Poland. According to a recent article by Mr. George Higgins of Catholic University in the Washington Post:

It has been reliably reported that anti-Semitic material, only thinly disguised, has been broadcast in Poland since martial law was imposed on December 13.

He cites the state-controlled Warsaw radio and press as trying to discredit Solidarity by accusing some of its top Jewish advisers of treason and other forms of unethical behavior. Furthermore, Mr. Higgins terms a tape recording of one such broadcast as "crudely anti-Semitic in content as well as tone," and he says that "it reads like an updated replay of a typical Nazi broadcast."

Less than 40 years ago, during World War II, the Polish authorities were also guilty of persecution of the Jews. At that time, under the direction of Hitler, close to 90 percent of the 3 million Polish Jews were annihilated. the Nazis came closer to their "final solution" in Poland than in any other country.

This tragedy led diplomats at the United Nations to draft the Genocide Treaty over a third of a century ago. Since 1948, 85 other nations have officially recognized and approved the convention—virtually every developed country in the world.

The Holocaust should also have provided more than enough impetus for Senate ratification. We have now been meeting for over 30 years since the treaty was referred for our consent and still we have not acted.

Today, Polish Jews are again the victims of concerted attacks by the Polish Government. I am not suggesting that genocide is occurring there now. I do, however, wish to expose the parallels of these two instances of man's inhumanity toward man taking place in the same country less than half a century apart. The treatment of Jews by the Jaruzelski regime in Poland serves as a reminder of the genocide that was practiced there under Hitler's direction.

Ratification of the convention would serve to demonstrate support for European Jews of the Second World War, as well as for all other peoples subject to persecution. Those of Poland are but one example.

Once again we are witnessing the ugliness of anti-Semitism in Poland. Therefore, once again I must call upon the Senate to ratify the Genocide Convention to help protect national, ethnic, racial, and religious groups from oppression.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the article by Mr. Higgins.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Jan. 13, 1981]

POLISH ANTI-SEMITISM: KEEPING THE BEAST ALIVE

(By George G. Higgins)

At the beginning of World War II there were approximately 3 million Jews in Poland. Today there are fewer than 10,000. The grisly story of what happened to the other 2,990,000 is one of the most horrible chapters in recorded history. Some few, very few, managed to escape to the West or go into hiding in Poland, but the majority died in the gas chambers at Auschwitz and other Nazi death camps.

Although tens of thousands of Polish Catholics, including substantial numbers of priests, were also executed by the Nazis in these same camps, the Holocaust was directed primarily at Jews not only in Poland but in all of Western Europe. The Nazis planned, with diabolical precision, to exterminate the Jewish people down to the youngest infant, and, tragically, came perilously close to doing so.

Many Westerners, Catholics included, seem incapable, even at this late date, of coping spiritually and psychologically with the Holocaust, and would prefer not even to think about it.

This kind of self-induced amnesia may help to explain in part why anti-Semitism of various kinds and in varying degrees is still alive, even in predominantly Christian nations.

One would have hoped, however, that in Poland at least, where Jews had suffered discrimination, at times even persecution, long before Hitler set out to exterminate them as a people, the few Jews who survived the Holocaust would be held in honor by their own government or at the very least would never again be the victims of anti-Semitism. Unfortunately things haven't worked out that way. More than once since the end of World War II, the ruling Communist Party in Poland has resorted to Nazi-style anti-Semitism for its own political purposes. It is now doing so again as part of its master plan to destroy the Solidarity labor movement in Poland and reinforce the party's centralized control over every aspect of Polish life and culture.

It has been reliably reported that anti-Semitic material, only thinly disguised, has been broadcast in Poland since martial law was imposed on Dec. 13. The state-controlled Warsaw radio and press have several times tried to discredit Solidarity by portraying some of its leading Jewish advisers as treasonous and morally corrupt. The American Jewish Committee has made a tape recording and translation of one such broadcast. Crudely anti-Semitic in content as well as tone, it reads like an updated replay of a typical Nazi broadcast.

It is also known that the official Polish news agency has featured anti-Semitic articles since martial law went into effect, again for the purpose of discrediting Solidarity.

According to unverified reports, Gen. Wojciech Jaruzelski, head of the military junta in Poland, has said privately that he has issued "categorical orders" to ban such broadcasts and newspaper articles. Even if accurate, these reports are meaningless. The general should have spoken out against anti-Semitism publicly, not privately, if only to correct the record and to let the Polish people know exactly where he and the junta stand on this issue.

Abraham Brumberg, author of a forthcoming book on Solidarity, is skeptical about Jaruzelski's sincerity on other grounds as well, "I am skeptical," he said, "because Jaruzelski has been prime minister since February. During this period, he countenanced the growth of an outright anti-Semitic organization and the use of anti-Semitic innuendoes in the Polish press, especially the army newspaper. Had Jaruzelski opposed the use of anti-Semitism as a traditional scapegoat mechanism, he could have put an end to it a long time ago."

If Jaruzelski wants to prove that he is sincerely opposed to anti-Semitism, he must do what Lech Walesa, chairman of Solidarity, has done repeatedly in the public forum. To his credit, Walesa has strongly condemned any and all forms of anti-Semitism in the most explicit of terms. I might add, in this connection, that while attending Solidarity's first national congress in Gdansk last Fall, I got the clear impression that Walesa's uncompromising views on this issue are shared by the overwhelming majority of Solidarity's officers and members. Solidarity is proud of the fact that almost all Poland's 10,000 Jewish citizens are active members of the movement and many leading Jewish intellectuals have served as expert advisers to the organization.

Whatever may have happened in the past, anti-Semitism would not be a serious problem in Poland now were it not for the government's efforts to keep it alive for its own political purposes. So long as martial law remains in force, the Polish people can do very little in a public way to counteract the government's vicious attack on the Jews. It remains, then, for Christians in the United States and other free nations and for Catholics in particular (since Poland is a predominantly Catholic country) to speak out vigorously in defense of Polish Jews.

The Catholic members of Solidarity and their religiously unaffiliated Gentile colleagues are obviously in desperate need of support, but at least they have the advantage of being 10 million strong, whereas their Jewish fellow-citizens are a defenseless minority of less than 10,000. If we Christians in the West fail to come to their defense, they will be left completely at the mercy of their enemies in the Polish government. We dare not condemn them to such a dreadful fate, for, if we do, it will not be long before the number of Jews in Poland will reach the zero point.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, do I have any time remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes. The Senator has 9 minutes remaining.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, who is to be recognized next under the order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana (Mr. QUAYLE).

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I have how much time remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Nine minutes.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Does any Senator on my side wish to utilize the 9 minutes I have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas has 15 minutes under a previous order.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I yield the 9 minutes that I have remaining to Mr. BENTSEN.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I do not mean to interfere, but does the Senator from Texas have the first special order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No. This is the time of the minority leader. The Senator from Texas has the second special order.

Mr. BAKER. I understand. The Senator from Indiana has the first special order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes.

Mr. BAKER. But the Senator from Texas is to aggregate the 9 minutes and the 15 minutes at this time? This is a separate subject.

Mr. BENTSEN. No; I doubt that I will need that full time. I was going to utilize the 9 minutes and dispose of it.

Mr. BAKER. I have no desire to interfere with the plan of the Senator from Texas. I note that the Senator from Indiana is on the floor, though, and I thought he had the first special order to speak. But this is not to change the sequence of special order speeches, and I certainly have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas.

Mr. BENTSEN. I hope that this has not been charged to my time, the 9 minutes.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may retain the 9 minutes and that I may yield to the Senator from Texas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

WORLD AGRICULTURAL TRADE

I. THE AMERICAN FARM AND INTERNATIONAL TRADE

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, this is the first in a series of statements I plan to make about our international trade policy as it relates to American agriculture.

I have been interested in this area of policy for some time because it is a matter of vital importance to American agriculture and our family farmers. I was a part of a U.S. congressional delegation to the multilateral trade negotiations (MTN) in Geneva in 1978, and I know how tough trade talks can be. I have met in my office with distinguished representatives from Europe, from Japan, and from other countries. I have heard them argue that we should "go easy" on this talk of promoting U.S. agricultural exports.

I, for one, believe that it is time to get tougher, not easier, on agricultural trade issues.

I believe it is high time to take a hard look at what is really going on in agricultural trade, to measure the impact of those events on the American farmer and the price he receives for his product.

As cochairman of the Senate Export Caucus, I arranged a meeting last fall with Secretary of Agriculture Block and Trade Representative Brock to discuss agricultural trade problems. Subsequent to that meeting I requested a hearing on this issue in the Finance Committee's International Trade Subcommittee, where I am the ranking minority member. Senator DANFORTH, the chairman of that important subcommittee, has agreed to schedule this hearing on February 11.

This will be an important meeting, Mr. President, because agricultural trade is fundamental to the free trade system and that system, in turn, is a crucial factor in the economic health of the American farmer.

THE PRECARIOUS STATE OF THE AMERICAN FAMILY FARM

Mr. President, as many Members of the Senate are aware, conditions in American agriculture are astonishingly poor. I say "astonishingly" because American agriculture is generally considered the world's success story. Our food stores are brim full. American consumers pay only 16 percent of disposable income for food, the lowest percentage in the world. Our farmers' productivity is the best in the world. While total U.S. merchandise trade wallowed in a $40 billion deficit last year, U.S. agriculture trade is $26 billion in surplus.

Yet the American family farmer is now worse off than at any time since the Depression. Profit margins for most major crops have dropped nearly 50 percent since 1974. Net income per acre has skidded from $11 in 1950 to barely $4 today. Total net farm income in 1980, adjusted for inflation, was the worst since the Depression. And the farmer's purchasing power from crop sales is only one-half of what it was 30 years ago.

It is important to understand that the American family farm is a highly capitalized economic activity that must service an increasing debt to maintain its capital equipment. The basic problem, Mr. President, is that farm debt is growing twice as fast as farm income. Farm debt was up 74 percent from 1976 to 1980, and farm assets increased 64 percent in the same period. But domestic farm prices received by farmers increased only 31 percent in the same period.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE IS CRUCIAL TO THE UNITED STATES

We are still strangely unaccustomed to thinking of America as a major trading nation. Yet, in agriculture, we are the world's leading trading nation and international trade plays a significant role in American agriculture. In fiscal year 1971, the United States supplied 36.7 percent of world wheat exports and 41.3 percent of world exports of coarse grains. In 1980, the wheat and course grains percentages were 41.1 percent and 69.1 percent, respectively. Exports provide 25 percent of all U.S. farmers' market returns today. We export one-half of our crops by value—about 60 percent of the value of our wheat, rice, and soybeans. The highly leveraged and mechanized U.S. agricultural industry, therefore, is increasingly dependent on unrestricted access to world markets.

Yet this dependency on world markets threatens to turn against the American farmer. Instead of the unrestricted access to world markets that he needs, the American farmer has been subjected to agricultural embargoes under the last four administrations, including this one. Through no fault of his own, the American farmer is being branded an unreliable supplier.

Instead of competing in a free-world market with prices set by the laws of supply and demand, our farmers are forced to sell their product in a marketplace where price is depressed by the dumping of subsidized exports by other countries. The American farmer is not given an opportunity to compete with farmers in other countries. The most efficient producer does not necessarily supply the third-country markets of the world. Rather, those markets are too often supplied by the most heavily subsidized producer.

In subsequent talks, I will address the trade practices of the European Community's wheat export subsidies on the United States. Secretary of Agriculture Block has estimated that these subsidies last year cost U.S. farmers 50 cents per bushel in reduced market prices and cost the Federal Government $400 million in increased deficiency payments. As recently as last Friday, Secretary Block announced an acreage reduction plan to cut down our deficiency payments.

Farmers are coming off 2 consecutive years in which real net farm income was the lowest since the Depression. Many forecasters suggest this year may be worse than the previous two. Farmers are borrowing planting money at horrendously high interest rates to plant crops they simply cannot sell for a profit at today's prices.

Given these very difficult circumstances and the increasing importance of agricultural trade, I believe it is high time for the United States to stand up for its rights for farmers and other industries in international trade.

In the coming days I will be addressing specific areas in which the American farmer—the world's most efficient producer—has been placed at a disadvantage by unfair trade policies.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article from the Wall Street Journal entitled "Shock for Growers."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SHOCK FOR GROWERS—FALLING GRAIN EXPORTS BRUISE THE FARM BELT; DAMAGE COULD SPREAD

(By Sue Shellenbarger)

HAVANA, ILL.—Selling food to foreign countries is big business in the Corn Belt town of 4,400 on the Illinois River. Lately, business hasn't been good. Many nations have cut their purchases of U.S. grain and people in Havana are feeling it in their pocketbooks.

Much road traffic in Havana still consists of trucks rumbling over the town's brick streets with hundreds of millions of dollars in grain to be loaded on barges headed for the port of New Orleans. But corn prices in Havana are down 25 percent from last year, and the volume of grain shipped from all Illinois River ports is down one-fifth.

Havana farmers, who send most of their grain abroad, have cut their spending plans and are signing up for government price supports at a fast clip. Farm-equipment dealers are hurting, and barge operators are feeling the pinch. At Havana National Bank, Chairman Frank Cook Jr. says: "Prices are depressed, and that hurts." What if conditions don't improve? "I'd retire," Mr. Cook says. "Conditions have to change."

Farm exports have fallen sharply nationwide, because of world slumps and tensions and because of competition from other countries. There have been declines before, but this time many of the causes seem unlikely to change soon. "We're dealing with some structural problems that are rooted in either economics or politics, and it will be difficult to turn these things around quickly," says Martin Abel, senior vice president of Schnittker Associates, Washington economic consultants.

END OF AN ERA

Apparently an era of explosive export growth, which brought about large increases in U.S. farm income and productivity, has ended. Although farm exports are likely to pick up from current depressed levels, their average growth through the 1980s won't approach the boom levels of the 1970s, experts say. That may slow food inflation for U.S. consumers, but U.S. farmers and the overall economy may suffer.

"World grain trade essentially doubled during the 1970s. That kind of increase simply can't go on," says D. Gale Johnson, a University of Chicago economics professor. Barring crop failures elsewhere, he says, "there will be two or three fairly painful years" for the farm economy.

Vincent Malanga, the senior economist at A. Gary Shilling & Co., New York economic consultants, predicts average annual growth of 2 percent for U.S. grain exports in the 1980s, down from 8 percent in the 1970s. That suggests, he says, that "the farm economy is going to be a relatively weak link in the general economy in the 1980s."

QUITE A SHOCK

The farm-export slump began in the year that ended last Sept. 30. Volume, falling far below forecasts, dropped by 1 percent. The picture has darkened since. Foreign sales and shipments of U.S. corn, wheat, soybeans and sorghum have been running 11 percent behind a year earlier.

To farmers accustomed to the last decade's soaring trade—spurred by rising world appetites for meat, milk, eggs and bread, plus the opening of huge markets such as the Soviet Union and China—the decline comes as a shock. After all, exports accounted for 85 percent of the growth in consumption of U.S. grains during the 1970s. By 1980, two-fifths of U.S. crops were being sent abroad, providing about 30 cents of each farmer's dollar of cash income. The trade surplus in agriculture grew twentyfold over the decade, to $26.7 billion in 1980.

In fact, the 1970s culminated in a near-shortage in 1980—when drought and three years' steady increase in export demand pushed U.S. grain prices sharply higher—and in fears of a 1981 shortage. Those fears were eradicated by the weather: Crop yields last fall were astonishingly high. But serious problems also arose, so that much of the surplus grain that normally would have flowed into world trade sat in farmers' bins instead. Some of the problems:

Rising interest rates around the world discouraged grain dealers from building inventories.

Food demand slowed in industrialized nations beset by recessions.

Rising debt forced many nations, already burdened by expenditures for imported oil, to devote more cash to debt payments and less to food imports.

The result of all these factors in Eastern Europe, where grain imports jumped at an annual rate of 30 percent or more in the last five years, is a mood of increasing austerity. In Romania, where a food-rationing program is in effect, President Nicolae Ceausescu, in a speech about disappointing harvest results, told Romanians they eat too much bread anyway and are getting too fat. In Yugoslavia, corn meal has been mixed with scarce wheat flour to make bread without raising wheat imports. U.S. grain exports to Eastern Europe are running 15 percent behind last year.

Another significant factor is the rising belief world-wide that the U.S. is willing to use trade embargoes as a political tool. President Ford suspended grain shipments to the Soviet Union for a time in 1975 amid a flap over the sales' effect on U.S. food prices, and in early 1980 President Carter embargoed a large part of U.S. sales to Russia over its invasion of Afghanistan.

Although President Reagan lifted that embargo, the recent Polish crackdown led him to postpone negotiations with Russia on a new grain-sales contract, and he hasn't ruled out further restrictions if the Polish situation worsens. All this makes some nations reluctant to depend heavily on the U.S. for food, and it encourages development of farm production in competing grain-exporting nations.

Since the 1980 U.S. embargo on Soviet grain trade, for example, the Soviets have turned Argentina into a virtual trade colony, and the U.S. share of Russian grain imports has slipped to 40 percent from 75 percent. After the embargo, the Russians more than quadrupled their share of Argentina's wheat and corn exports to 80 percent and 88 percent, respectively.

Elsewhere, self-sufficiency campaigns are cutting into grain imports. Mexico, U.S. farmers' third-biggest customer, is trying to avoid food dependence on "the colossus of the north" and managed last year, with the help of good weather, to grow all the beans and corn it needed for the first time, in 10 years.

There are other long-term factors. Whitney MacMillan, the chairman of Cargill Inc. of Minneapolis, the big community merchandiser and processor, cites rising competition from grain-exporting nations that, "largely left out of the export growth of the 1970s, are now finally gearing up to serve this demand." Aided by grain price supports and import duties, farmers in the European Economic Community for the first time in many years have become net exporters of grain instead of importers. European grain exports could rise 50 percent of 1985, Mr. MacMillan estimates. Canada, too, plans to increase its grain exports sharply.

Competition already has cut into U.S. trade in some of the hottest world markets. In the Middle East, "there's a strong growth in demand, but competitors are getting a bigger share," says John B. Parker, an Agriculture Department economist. France and Brazil recently have captured much of the growth in food imports by the Saudis.

All told, the U.S. share of world trade in grain and soybeans dropped to 52 percent in the 1980–81 marketing year from 56 percent the year before.

GAINS POSSIBLE

U.S. farm trade could pick up, of course, if crop failures force grain-importing nations to assign food imports a higher priority. An improvement in the world economy could spur sharp increases in trade with such big potential markets as China. And meat and poultry consumption in most of the world still lags behind the U.S. diet of 240 pounds a year. Czechoslovaks consume about 170 pounds, for example, and Mexicans about 64 pounds.

But the biggest new markets, such as the Soviet Union, are already open, and the potential for a renewed surge in growth is outweighed for now by other factors.

In the U.S. Farm Belt, many farmers are painfully aware of the export slowdown and are puzzled by it. "You bet I think of it," says Havana farmer Doyle Walker. Most of Mr. Walker's crops are usually sold abroad. In December, prices for corn in Havana dropped 15 cents a bushel, roughly 5%, instead of rising as they normally do at that time of year. The reason was international tension over the Polish situation: Buyers thought that the U.S. might impose another grain embargo against the Soviet Union; that would depress prices, so the buyers held back, anticipating better deals later.

Lunching at Waterworth's restaurant in downtown Havana, Fred Reeves, the manager of the Havana elevator of Growmark Inc., a farm cooperative based in Bloomington, Ill, muses about such influences. "There's been a tremendous change," He says. "Fifteen years ago, we weren't a world market. We were a domestic market. All of a sudden the farmer has to answer to world demand, to what's happening in Hungary, in Poland, in Argentina. Fifteen years ago, we wouldn't have thought of it."

SQUARE IN THE EYE

Across town, at Melvin Weakly's John Deere farm-equipment dealership, Mr. Weakly and his manager, Delbert Sielschott, spend much time cutting their inventories and talking about sluggish grain demand. In 1981, "a lot of farmers just couldn't generate enough income to buy equipment," says Mr. Weakly, and the year was his worst ever. "We don't see too much of a future, up to the mid-1980s," for grain demand. "We try to look the situation square in the eye," Mr. Weakly says. Concludes Mr. Sielschott: "And it looks pretty bad."

Along the Illinois, as many as 100 idle barges backed up at some parts even before last month's freeze, and barge rates plunged 20% or more. About one-fourth, or "tens of thousands," of U.S. railroads' grain-hauling cars are idle, says the American Association of Railroads.

Taxpayers are starting to pay for the slump, too. The Agriculture Department in December handed out $400 million to wheat farmers to compensate them for low prices. And farmers have put a record 1.16 billion bushels of corn in storage under a government price-support reserve program—an amount worth $2.8 billion at today's prices and equal in volume to the entire Indonesian rice crop.

If the slowdown continues, as many experts say it will, it could affect the whole economy. Food-price inflation, barring crop failures, is likely to be slowed by ample grain supplies and to lag behind the general inflation rate for much of the 1980s, Mr. Malanga of Shilling says. Cheaper feed for livestock will lead to "a more healthy climate" for producing beef, pork and chicken, says the University of Chicago's Mr. Johnson.

But the export boom of the 1970s benefited the economy in other ways. Based on an Agriculture Department calculation that every one million metric tons of U.S. farm exports generates 100 jobs, about 16,000 people last year owed their jobs to these exports. Farm exports also reduce the need for costly government price-support programs and help raise the dollar's value against other currencies by improving the U.S.'s overall trade balance. Besides, those who prosper from exports spend more, spreading their prosperity around.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, I yield to the distinguished senior Senator from the State of Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I wish to congratulate the Senator from Texas (Mr. BENTSEN) for bringing to our attention and seeking hearings on a problem of enormous importance to the United States. As he has said, while agricultural trade appears to be a winner for the United States—because we have an annual agricultural trade surplus—the American farmer is anything but happy with the world trade situation. He is as bad off as he has ever been.

It seems to me that the European agricultural program is designed without any regard for international obligations. What it boils down to is this: The European Communities sets the price on European agricultural products, and they set it high. Naturally, this stimulates production, and then, rather than bear the cost of storing their excess production, they simply dump it on world markets.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a table which I have in my hand showing a comparison between the minimum loan rates in the 1981 farm bill and the so-called intervention price of the European Communities.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COMPARISON OF THE EUROPEAN COMMUNITIES INTERVENTION PRICES FOR 1981–82 WITH THE UNITED STATES 1981 FARM BILL MINIMUM LOAN RATES/SUPPORT PRICES [1]

[Dollars per bushel, except as shown]

	U.S. minimum loan rates/ support prices	European Communities intervention prices
Wheat (soft)	3.55	4.90
Corn	2.55	4.57

[1] Sources: Of European Communities prices: European Community press release, August 1981 for March 1981; and Foreign Agriculture, July 1981, converted for dollar/ECU ratios provided by the U.S. Foreign Agriculture Service. Of United States prices: Public Law 97–98.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, now the difference between the U.S. program and the European program is not just that the U.S. support price is lower than the European price. It is that the U.S. support price represents a totally different concept. The American price is a distress at which the farmer may forfeit his product to the Government. It is well below market prices. The European intervention price is well above the market price. For example, on this table it shows that the European Communities' intervention price for 1981–82 is $4.90 per bushel on corn. All the corn European producers can produce will be bought by the European Communities at that price. The U.S. minimum loan rate for corn in the same period under the farm bill is $2.55 per bushel, so if the U.S. market does not go above that price, then at the end of 18 months, U.S. farmers will forfeit their corn to the Commodity Credit Corporation, and, of course, probably take a loss. And where is the market price? As of Wednesday, January 27, 1981, the Wall Street Journal reports that the price of corn is $2.67 a bushel, 12 cents a bushel above the U.S. support price and $1.90 below the European intervention price. So our programs soften farmers' distress; European programs subsidize more and more production. Now, this effect is relatively small now, because the U.S. dollar is strong. If the dollar weakened to the point where it was only 9 months ago, the European Communities' subsidy would be $3.20 per bushel.

I also wish to point out the violence that the European program does to poor countries around the world who trade in these commodities. Europe is not a member of the International Sugar Organization, so they have no obligation to stock excess sugar production. They basically do the same thing with that sugar as they do with the grains. They dump it on the market.

Now this depresses the price in the United States. We are not a sugar exporter for the most part. However, poor countries around the world, which this Nation is trying to help with zero duty access to the United States and other measures perhaps about to be suggested by the President, are hurt by that European dumping more than they can be helped by anything we can do. Many nations support the United States in deploring European sugar programs. So far as I can tell, the European governments cannot agree on whether to do anything about it.

These matters, and what the U.S. Government plans to do about them, are certainly appropriate subjects for hearings. They go to the heart of the current question, whether the multilateral trading system provides us with real reciprocity. I personally believe the game is fixed, but I look forward to the hearings that Senator BENTSEN and Senator DANFORTH are going to hold with eager anticipation.

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Louisiana for his continued long interest in agriculture and for his concern and contribution.

● Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, the Senator from Texas has noted that the Subcommittee on International Trade of the Committee on Finance will be holding hearings next week on a very important subject—the protection afforded by domestic law to our producers, particularly our farmers, against subsidized exports.

Chairman DANFORTH and Senator BENTSEN have been instrumental in bringing to the attention of the Senate and the public the problems faced by our farmers in competing for sales in third country markets with subsidized products from the European Community. I fully support their efforts in exploring these problems and finding solutions for them.

THE EC COMMON AGRICULTURAL POLICY IS HURTING U.S. FARMERS

There is no question that but for the system of tariffs and levies maintained by the European Community, our farmers could sell greatly increased quantities of their products in the European Community itself. But the Europeans have determined that in their own interests increased imports of such lower cost products are not desirable. They have set internal support prices, which generally are above world levels, and then protected their producers through a system which guarantees that no unwanted imports can be sold at less than their support price. In the absence of controls on production this policy has resulted in the production of certain products far in excess of their internal needs. This excess production is now being exported to third country markets in competition with American produced agricultural products. Since the EC producers do not produce at competitive world prices, this excess production can be sold only if subsidized. The EC has been increasingly willing to undertake such subsidization and this unfair competition has hurt our farmers who do not have such advantages.

THE EC MUST REFORM THE CAP

To the extent that the CAP results in EC producers obtaining more than an equitable share of world export trade, results in underpricing, or otherwise nullifies or impairs U.S. GATT rights, such policies should be vigorously attacked through established GATT procedures. I fully support this administration in the increased efforts it is demonstrating under section 301 to bring complaints against alleged GATT violations. To date, however, the EC has not demonstrated that it is willing to make the reforms in its CAP program necessary to prevent it from unfairly causing injury to our farmers.

Last October, the EC Commisson forwarded recommendations to the EC Council for reforming the CAP. While I do not believe the steps outlined were themselves sufficient, they were in the right direction. To date even the modest reforms proposed have not been adopted.

Unless the CAP is reformed there can only be increased friction between the EC and supplier countries. The high EC support price for grain has caused EC producers to shift to lower priced imports for animal feeds. U.S. soybeans and corn gluten, which benefit from zero duty bindings, are a cost-effective substitute for higher priced EC feeds and as a result enjoy remarkable popularity in the EC and, coincidently, benefit EC consumers. Thus, the CAP itself stimulates U.S. exports of some products through artificial price relationships and in turn program more costly.

To the extent that the CAP encourages overproduction and the increased need to export at subsidized prices, it also will increase pressures on the United States to take corrective action.

THE EC CANNOT BE PERMITTED TO EXPORT ITS UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. President, I am aware of the high unemployment rate in Europe. I am also aware that over 8 percent of the work force in the EC is employed in agriculture. With the tremendous unemployment in the manufacturing sector in the EC, there is intense pressure to prevent further migration from agricultural jobs.

But this country is experiencing 9 percent unemployment, the virtual equivalent of the European situation.

We cannot ask our farmers to accept more unemployment, lower prices, and an unacceptably lower standard of living in order that more farmers can be employed in Europe. This simply is not fair to our farmers and will not solve the problems of European agriculture. Self-sufficiency in the production of food stuffs is a very sensitive issue both in Europe and here. Noncompetitive production is not the answer, however. It does not benefit consumers; it harms the more competitive producers in other countries and it continues a practice which is increasingly difficult to change.

VISIT OF EC OFFICIALS

Mr. President, next week the European Community will send three representatives to the United States for talks with their counterparts in this country. Vice Presidents Hafenkamp, Davignon, and Agriculture Commissioner Dalsager will all be here. I am sure they will be greeted and their meetings will be conducted in the spirit of friendship and cooperation which has historically characterized U.S.-EC relations. I am hopeful that, in addition, they can be made aware of the very sensitive and serious problems which the EC agricultural policy poses for U.S. farmers. I know these problems will be brought to our attention in the February 11 hearings.●

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR QUAYLE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Indiana (Mr. QUAYLE) is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

S. 2036—THE TRAINING FOR JOBS PROGRAM
S. 2037—VETERANS EMPLOYMENT AND TRAINING ACT OF 1982
S. 2038—DEFENSE PROCUREMENT TRAINING DEMONSTRATION PROJECT ACT

Mr. QUAYLE. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation to create a new training for jobs program, which is aimed at preparing America's untrained youth and long-term unemployed to return to the productive job market.

The provisions of the training for jobs program are consistent with the outline I shared with my colleagues on November 24, 1981, when I described the approach the Subcommittee on Employment and Productivity would take in designing an employment training program.

Increasing the productivity of our work force and assisting the economically disadvantaged in our society to enter the economic mainstream have never been matters for partisan dispute. I am proud to announce that the training for jobs bill and the associated bill I am introducing today have had bipartisan support from the outset.

Mr. President, the training for jobs bill is being cosponsored by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY).

I wish to thank the Senator for his support, ideas, and leadership on this issue. I know that he has been intensely involved throughout his whole Senate career in trying to define the scope and the responsibility of the Federal Government and its relationship not only with States and local communities but more importantly its relationship and responsibilities to human beings and the people of this Nation.

I am also pleased to announce that, as well as Senator KENNEDY, we have two other dedicated members of the Employment and Productivity Subcommittee, Senator PAULA HAWKINS and Senator CLAIBORNE PELL as original cosponsors.

The first objective of this new program is to strengthen the involvement of the private sector. This bill allows training programs authorized under this act to be planned and administered by local Private Industry Councils (PIC's). I am proposing that a majority of the members of each council must be representatives of private business. But it is also important to have a balance and a breadth of experience. Accordingly, I have also proposed that representatives be included from local government, educational agencies, organized labor, the Employment Service, and community-based organizations.

I am fully aware that such a transition of planning and administrative responsibility from the current prime sponsor to a Private Industry Council will not be accomplished overnight and good judgment must prevail for all concerned. I have incorporated into this bill provisions for such a transition only when the Governor of the State involved and the local PIC agree that the changeover should, in fact, be accomplished. When that decision is made, the local PIC will be designated to administer the program.

In keeping with the Reagan administration's goal of redefining State and Federal responsibilities, my bill redesigns oversight responsibility, increasing the role of the State governments and decreasing that of the Federal Government. The Governors will have the authority to make changes in service delivery areas, to make them more compatible with labor market needs and local realities.

The Governors, rather than the Secretary of Labor, will approve the local service delivery area plans, determine the administrative adequacy of each local PIC for certification, apply rewards and sanctions to recipient programs based upon performance, and will be responsible for fiscal control, fund accounting, and audits within their States. Each Governor will also have authority to adjust Federal performance criteria in keeping with specific economic factors which exist in the service delivery areas within each State. Clearly, the Governor's responsibility and authority in this program has been greatly enhanced.

I want to emphasize that this bill creates a training program. As our resources become increasingly scarce, we need to determine just what we want to accomplish and then design a program to meet those goals. We wanted a program to train people for jobs. That is what this bill does.

This bill is not an income-maintenance program. The payment of training allowances is prohibited. There is no provision for public service employment programs. This training for jobs program is not all things to all people. Its purpose and goals are clearly defined and clearly stated: It is to train people to get jobs.

I am proposing we target funds for those people who even under the best of circumstances cannot compete in the labor market because of their lack of education or training. We are going to help those people who cannot afford to pay for training by themselves. I believe we must be consistent and unyielding in our effort to help these people who cannot help themselves prepare for productive employment. This bill is also quite specific in its provision for a set-aside for disadvantaged youth under 22 years of age.

The most recent Department of Labor statistics show an unemployment rate of 21.7 percent for teenagers in the 16-to-19 age bracket. Even more disturbing is the fact that unemployment among minority youth is approaching 45 percent, five times the rate for all workers. The implications of these statistics—not only for the present but for the future of these young people—are overwhelming.

Will we have productively employed persons contributing to the health of the economy, or will we have increased welfare payments, income transfers, and even higher crime rates? This bill provides for 50 percent of the funds to be allocated to youth training programs. This percentage can be adjusted in the local service areas by the difference between the local ratio of disadvantaged youth and the nationwide ratio. This provision provides some flexibility for adjustments if the youth population is significantly lower or higher in individual areas.

The training for jobs program incorporates a great deal of flexibility in program design. It is outcome oriented, not procedure oriented. We are interested in results and the results we are looking for are clearly specified in the bill. For adults, we are looking for increased earnings and reductions in cash welfare payments, as a result of training received in the program. For youth, we are looking for development of usable skills that employers can put to good use. Job placement and employment retention are important goals.

I emphasize the performance-standards provisions of the legislation because we are looking for results; we are looking for the numbers of people who actually get jobs. We are trying to make clear that which is expected for the money which will be spent on this program. Those results—or lack of results—will be watched closely. That lack of orientation might have been one of the most serious problems with the CETA program. No person had a good definition of success. Standards for performance were lacking in many cases, partly because some people lost sight of the original intentions of the program.

Accountability depends on established standards by which performance can be measured. This bill includes such standards. It is required that the Governor take corrective action if a local PIC fails to meet the standards for 2 years. Governors will first be permitted to provide technical assistance to local programs which do not meet performance criteria. If the failure persists, the Governor must propose a reorganization plan. That plan may restructure the local PIC, prohibit the use of designated delivery agencies, or make any other changes the Governor determines is necessary to improve performance.

The Governor may also propose the selection of an alternative administrator for the service delivery area. It is expected that accountability in this program will be at a level considerably higher than was expected or enforced under the CETA program.

With the Federal budget under close scrutiny, and the desire to reduce the deficit, I am proposing that the training for jobs program be funded only at the same basic level as the current level for funding the CETA program. Since the new program will be operating with less funds than it really needs, it must be more efficient. This requires a system that is not duplicative, that concentrates on essentials, and that uses all the resources which are available.

The Labor Department has estimated that 2 million persons will be served in fiscal 1982 under the funding level provided by the continuing resolution for the CETA program. In order that at least as many people are trained during the first year of the training for jobs program, we have made a concerted effort to provide for coordination, at least in the planning function, with the employment and training-related programs already being administered at the State level. The bill provides for the local Employment Service plans to be prepared by the PIC in the service delivery area. We are doing this to assure that the employment and training programs in the local area are coordinated and that all the local entities are involved. At the same time, the bill requires that the Employment Service be represented on the PIC in each service delivery area. The bill permits Governors to combine two or more advisory councils whose functions relate to employment or training. This provision may contribute to increased coordination between agencies at the State level.

A major provision of the bill is title V—the dislocated worker program. It is intended to offer assistance and training for displaced worker program. Recent hearings on unemployment in the automobile industry, brought to the attention of the Subcommittee on Employment and Productivity, which I chair, that by 1985 as many as 500,000 auto and auto-related jobs will be eliminated. This training for jobs program will provide assistance for job search, job development, training in job skills, for which demand exceeds supply, support services, relocation assistance, and programs conducted in cooperation with employers or labor organizations to provide early intervention in the event of a plant closure.

The bill provides for the States to identify workers who have been laid off and are ineligible for, or who have exhausted their entitlement to, unemployment compensation and who are unlikely to return to their previous positions. States are to determine what job opportunities exist within the labor markets, or outside such areas, for which workers could be retrained. Simply put, the States are to bring together the unemployed workers with the training programs in order to prepare individuals to work in unfilled, existing jobs.

I am proposing we provide $100 million for the dislocated workers program, with the understanding that the money will be matched, on a 50-50 basis, with private, State, or local moneys.

In addition to the main training for jobs legislation, I am also introducing the Veterans Employment and Training Act of 1982. This bill will establish a separate program of employment and training services exclusively for veterans. The bill is the result of a great deal of thought on how to respond to the employment needs of veterans, especially veterans of the Vietnam era, who have had trouble readjusting to civilian life.

For the sake of efficiency and fiscal commonsense, we must provide a systematic approach to veterans' employment and training problems. A program dedicated to their needs is in order—a program in which they are not continually competing for scarce training slots, and in which they are not buried under layers of rules, regulations, and administrative redtape.

The training and employment of veterans is a national concern. This bill will bring the counseling, training, and placement services for veterans together under one program.

The Veterans Rehabilitation and Education Amendments of 1980 elevated the Deputy Assistant Secretary of Labor for Veterans Employment to the level of Assistant Secretary. Very recently, Mr. William C. Plowden was confirmed to that position. I am proposing that we allow Mr. Plowden, under the direction of the Secretary of Labor, to administer a consolidated and coordinated veterans program to provide the needed career services to this deserving segment of our society.

Finally, I would like to emphasize that the improvement of the skills and abilities of our labor force is an enormous task and it is a task in which many sectors of our economy must play an active role. The primary role belongs to private enterprise, and we must insure that Government policies do not inhibit private investment in training.

I am also today introducing the Defense Procurement Training Demonstration Project Act. This bill is offered as a preliminary suggestion of one approach in dealing with the skill shortages which threaten to impede our capacity to build the industrial base necessary for our defense buildup.

The bill requires the Secretary of Labor to publish a list of skilled occupations in which there is a substantial projected shortage, and then authorizes the Secretary of Defense to select from this list those skills in which a shortage will have an adverse impact on defense procurement. With respect to any large contract requiring the use of such skills, the Secretary of Defense is authorized to require the contractor or subcontractor to provide the training in that occupation.

This is a demonstration project only, and the Secretary of Defense is to report to the Congress on its efficiency within 30 months. The bill also contains a provision to facilitate the donation of surplus machine tools and related equipment to vocational education schools in order to assist those schools in providing necessary skill training.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the three bills and the explanatory materials be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. QUAYLE. Mr. President, at this time I yield to my distinguished colleague from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, first of all, I commend the Senator from Indiana (Mr. QUAYLE) for his initiative in an area of great importance to this Nation. Under his leadership we are today taking an important first step to improve the quality of life for people in this country who are without jobs and without the particular skills to permit them to have a productive role in our society. He has assumed the responsibility as chairman of the Employment Subcommittee, and has held extensive hearings on this particular issue.

I have over the period of the last year been extremely impressed by how he has researched this issue and by the energy, the interest and intelligence he has brought to an area of public policy with which we all have been grappling for some period of years.

I believe that in fashioning this legislation, Senator QUAYLE has carefully considered the ideas of a number of different members of the committee. He has been consistent in his own commitment on this issue. He has been willing to listen to the suggestions and ideas of other members of the committee. He has studied those suggestions carefully, and it has been a matter of very special pleasure to work with him in fashioning and shaping this legislation which has strong bipartisan support.

We know there is still a long way to go before this legislation is actually enacted into law, and until we get the resources necessary for getting the job done.

But I want to take this opportunity to join with my other colleagues in commending what is a significant initiative by the Senator from Indiana who has accepted very important responsibilities in the Committee on Human Resources in a very, very important area of public policy.

I thank the Senator for all his courtesy. I look forward to working with him in the future on this and other issues.

We act today on a bipartisan basis to try to answer the pleas of the unemployed. The economy is in deep recession. Over 9½ million Americans are out of work. On Friday, the unemployment rate will almost certainly climb above 9 percent, the highest level since the Great Depression. And the Secretary of the Treasury tells us that 10 percent will not be far behind.

The statistics themsleves are bad enough. But even worse is the human tragedy. Young Americans cannot find their first job to start their future. Men and women who have labored all their lives now find themselves confronting layoff slips. They find unemployment benefits slashed, employment offices closed, public service jobs abolished, and job training programs ended.

Senator QUAYLE and I believe there is a better way. The bill we are introducing today sends a different message to all who want to work but who cannot find a job. The Training for Jobs Act will bring them greater hope and a better opportunity for a job. It is designed to provide the skills they need to compete for jobs that too often go unfilled.

We have heard too much about the advertisements in the want ads. The vast majority of those positions can be filled only by people with skills—in areas such as computer programing, health care, the secretarial field, and the service industries. In spite of double-digit unemployment, the demand is high today and will be even higher in the future for workers skilled enough to fill such needs.

The Training for Jobs Act will create a new partnership for the 1980's. Washington will join with States and local governments in this effort. And most important it will join with private industry. The emphasis will be on permanent jobs in the private sector. We are asking business to be a full partner, to join with mayors and Governors, with organized labor and community-based organizations to help America train workers for the Nation's future.

CETA will expire in September 1982. If we succeed in the effort begun today, the old CETA will be replaced by the new Training for Jobs Act. Total funding will be $3.9 billion in fiscal year 1983—exactly the level of CETA funding for the current fiscal year.

We have learned from past experience. We know that training the disadvantaged is a good investment. It makes taxpayers out of tax users. It raises the Nation's productivity. It is the best kind of supply-side economics, because it is not just investment in tools and robots, but investment in human capital, too.

We also know that there is no payoff in training workers for jobs that do not exist. That is where business will make its contribution. CEO's will work with local officials and community groups to plan this program. They will help decide what jobs to train for, and they will design the training for those jobs. In return, they will reap the benefit of qualified employees whom business all too often cannot find today.

Governors will be asked to do more. It will be their task to see that public funds are spent effectively so that workers are trained and placed in productive jobs. Mayors will be on the firing line as well, insuring that no citizens in their communities are left behind.

Performance will be measured. The rules will be clear, and all who participate will be required to follow them. Good programs will be rewarded with increased funding, and bad ones will get their own layoff slips.

This legislation is a fair compromise reached after long negotiation. It is not the program that either Senator QUAYLE or I originally proposed. But we are confident that it is a realistic start toward meeting one of the Nation's most urgent economic needs—jobs for those who want them.

The program is new—but it is not the New Federalism. It is not a turnback program for the States. And it is certainly not a turn-your-back program for the poor, the hungry, and the unemployed. In this legislation we reaffirm the Nation's free enterprise system by establishing a new national commitment to work and to the men and women who perform it.

Mr. QUAYLE. Mr. President, as the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts has pointed out, this is just the beginning.

I believe, in looking at the four cosponsors of this bill, myself, and Senator HAWKINS on this side of the aisle, Senator KENNEDY and Senator PELL on the other side of the aisle, it truly demonstrates that this is bipartisan.

Unemployment in this Nation is not a partisan issue. It is a bipartisan issue. The unemployment that Senator KENNEDY talked about being as high as 9 percent now and, perhaps, going higher in the latter part of this week and later into this spring is obviously a fact that makes all of us reflect very, very seriously on a national problem.

Since unemployment is a national problem, Mr. President, we are committed to implement this national training program. Training is the heartbeat of this legislation. It is not an income-maintenance program; it is not an income-security program. It is a training program. It is precisely what the title says: "Training for Jobs."

I can only recall that at a recent press conference the President of the United States referred to 24 pages of classified ads in the Washington Post for employment. The President was correct. There are a number of jobs that are wanting, but the problem is not necessarily jobs, which is a problem because the economy is not expanding but contracting right now. Even more important is the fact that the problem is one of training. There are some jobs now that are available. But the point is that many of our people are not trained for those jobs.

The issue today is what the future jobs are going to be.

There has been testimony before our committee that we will see computer technology, electronics being the wave of the future. Not many of our young people, not many of our displaced adults, are trained for that particular type of skill. The old saying is: "Let us not always feel that the remedy to the unemployed and out-of-work is to just give them a fish. Let us teach them how to fish, to train our people for productive employment; give them a skill so they can provide for themselves so they can provide for their families."

This is not a State issue; it is not a local issue. It is a national issue. It will always be a national issue. Unemployment is a national issue. The economy is a national issue.

Mr. President, I again want to compliment the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, and also the two other original cosponsors of this legislation, Senator HAWKINS for her personal involvement and Senator PELL for his personal involvement.

Both of these Senators, in addition to Senator KENNEDY, have discussed with us ideas, improvements we can make in this legislation, and I look forward to proceeding in a bipartisan way to provide the most effective, the most efficient job training program that this Nation has ever seen.

COMPREHENSIVE EMPLOYMENT AND TRAINING ACT

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, over the past year, there has been a great debate in the Congress and in the administration about the future of the programs authorized by the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act (CETA). Senator QUAYLE, chairman of the Labor and Human Resources Employment and Productivity Subcommittee, today is introducing legislation that would continue the Federal involvement in employment and training. I am pleased to join as an original cosponsor of this bill and would like to explain why.

Since the beginning of this century, our country has struggled to define the proper role of the Federal Government in the area of employment and training. In many ways, the national consensus on the nature of this role has come full circle over the past 70 years. The commonly held view at the turn of the century was that economic misfortune and joblessness was the result of a lack of personal virtue. There was no support for any direct Federal intervention to provide assistance to help individuals break into or remain in the labor force. This attitude was radically altered by the Great Depression, when our national economy worsened to the point that entire communities found themselves out of work. Citizens then began to look to Washington for help.

With the creation of the New Deal programs in the 1930's, the Federal Government became the employer of last resort and hired millions of jobless workers who went on to successfully complete public works projects around the country. By the next decade, most of our employable population was involved in some form of military-related work. As a result, there was less of a need for direct Federal job creation and more of a need for the Government to provide nationwide training so that those who remained stateside could keep the economy going. The success of these training programs during the war years paved the way for the passage of the GI bill, which expanded educational and job opportunities for veterans.

Despite all of these separate initiatives, it was not until 1962 that a comprehensive national manpower development program was enacted, and it focused on providing financial subsidies and special training opportunities to skilled workers who found themselves out of work. With the subsequent enactment in 1964 of the Economic Opportunity Act, the emphasis of Federal employment training programs began to shift away from providing assistance to temporarily laid-off skilled workers to providing more basic educational skills and job training opportunities for youth, the economically disadvantaged, and the long-term unemployed.

In 1973, the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act (CETA) was passed. It consolidated all Federal employment training programs and gave local governments and community-based organizations more discretion over how the funds were to be spent in their areas. During the recession of the mid-1970's, the Federal Government took steps to reduce unemployment by expanding CETA to include countercyclical public sector unemployment programs. Unfortunately, however, the way to best use public service jobs as stepping stones to permanent employment in the private sector was never sufficiently thought out, and the programs that were undertaken soon ran into problems. As a result of these difficulties, public confidence in these efforts was undermined and the program was scaled down before it had sufficient opportunity to work.

It is this most recent experience with public sector employment that has set the tone for the current view in some quarters that the Government should no longer play a substantial role in the area of employment and training. During last year's debate on the Budget Reconciliation Act, Congress voted to terminate CETA public service employment and reduced Federal support for job training programs for young people and those who have consistently remained out of the work force. While I agree that our most recent experience with public sector employment was not as successful as it could have been and that improvement must be made in existing Federal job training programs, I do not believe that the Government should turn its back on the unemployed and disadvantaged in our society. National fiscal and monetary policy has contributed to our current economic condition and in many ways is directly responsible for the fact that we are currently experiencing the highest levels of unemployment since World War II. Further, at a time when Federal support for social programs is dwindling, it is crucial for Congress to develop a proposal that would improve existing Federal job training programs and reduce unemployment.

One of our highest priorities as a Nation should be to get our citizens back to work, and the Federal Government must be prepared to do whatever is necessary to achieve this goal. For a number of reasons, it would be optimistic to expect the present CETA program to accomplish this task. From the beginning, CETA has lacked a clear mandate. Local governmental units have been responsible for developing employment programs for their labor market areas without a great deal of coordination at the State level. Very little was done to develop linkages between local prime sponsors within the State; to develop a comprehensive plan to match available workers with available jobs in other parts of the State, and to retain skilled workers who have been displaced because of changing conditions in the economy.

This is not to say that local governments and community organizations were incapable of making these decisions. From the time the CETA program was created, local prime sponsors dealt directly with Washington and there was never an opportunity for them to develop an appropriate working relationship with their State capitols.

Senator QUAYLE's effort to increase the involvement of States in employment and training programs is a good start down the road toward making the CETA system more efficient. I will continue to work with him and my other colleagues on the Labor and Human Resources Committee to develop a proposal which strikes the appropriate balance between State and local interests. It is clear that no Federal employment program can be successful without the active participation of local elected officials, education, business and labor leaders, and community-based organizations. These individuals must be given the flexibility to define the types of employment services that are needed in their areas and the wherewithal to administer these programs. The Governors, on the other hand, must become more involved in coordinating the individual programs in their States and monitoring their effectiveness.

It is my hope that by opening the channel of communication between the States and local prime sponsors, we will breathe new life into CETA and create a system of which all of us can be proud.

● Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, I am pleased to join Senator QUAYLE as an original cosponsor of the Training for Jobs Act. I am also pleased that we have developed a bill that has bipartisan support from members of the Senate Employment and Productivity Subcommittee. Senators PELL, KENNEDY, QUAYLE, and I are not known for our unanimity of opinion on CETA. However, we share a commitment to improving the employment opportunities for hard-to-employ individuals, and that is why we have reached agreement.

The central theme of our legislation is to enhance the role given to private industry councils. Private industry councils were established under CETA as a vehicle to allow the business community to develop employment and training programs to serve the disadvantaged. While PIC's usually only advised CETA prime sponsors by presenting them with the views and recommendations of the local business community, PIC's under the Training for Jobs Act will develop job programs for entire service delivery areas when Governors select them to do so. Based on prior performance, PIC's deserve a larger role.

The Broward County Employment and Training Administration's electronic upgrade program is one typical success story. The Broward Industry Council administers an electronics upgrade program that bridges the gap between available jobs which require special skills and the unemployed, the majority of which are unskilled. This upgrade program bridges this gap by training employed individuals for better jobs thereby creating entry level jobs for unskilled CETA participants. And it is working.

An enhanced role for private industry councils is also supported by many organizations with employment and training programs. In testimony before the Subcommittee on Employment and Productivity, the U.S. Conference on Mayors, the National Association of Counties, the chamber of commerce, and the Business Roundtable all agree that PIC's should be given a larger role in developing and administering employment and training programs. As Sylvan Meyer, publisher of the Miami magazine and chairman of the Private Industry Council of Dade County pointed out in testimony before our subcommittee, 85 percent of the available jobs are in the private sector, and private employers already spend $40 to $100 billion annually on training activities. Therefore, the Congress should take the opportunity open to us by enlisting experienced executives who expend these dollars and also sit on private industry councils in our fight to create jobs.

This training for jobs legislation is consistent with President Reagan's efforts to decentralize Government by returning planning and administration of programs to State and local control. Our bill vests administration and allocation of funding responsibilities with the Governor of each State to be transferred to the local private industry councils when they are established. The design and administrative structure of employment and training programs is not mandated by Washington, but can vary from State to State.

Furthermore, our bill replaces the existing myriad of Federal regulations that concentrate on process rather than results. The performance standards contained in the training for Jobs Act are results orientated: a program's effectiveness is judged by the increase in earnings and the reductions in cash welfare payments or participants it generates.

But not all standards will be alike. Performance standards for youth programs differ from adult programs because the goals differ. Youth programs will try to improve the employability of youth workers by teaching job skills that will assist them over the long term. However, youth and adult Federal performance standards will be flexible enough to allow States to adapt them to local conditions. Programs that fail to meet these performance standards within 2 years, after receiving technical assistance, must be reorganized or replaced.

Previously, there was speculation that the Job Corps and other federally administered programs would be eliminated. This legislation specifically continues the Job Corps, Indian programs, and migrant and seasonal workers programs at the national level. Under the Training for Jobs Act, they will be funded at approximately the same percentage as they were under the old CETA program. These programs are continued at the national level because of the special circumstances and needs of the individuals they serve. The Job Corps program, which provides highly intensive training and education services in a residential setting, has proven to be very successful. It has a 90 percent positive termination rate, therefore our bill reauthorizes the Jobs Corps program without substantive amendments. The very nature of migrant and seasonal workers' employment makes it difficult, if not impossible, for States to formulate job-training programs to help them. Finally, the national administration of job training and employment programs for Indians is based on the traditional government-to-goverment relationship between the United States and the Indian tribes. There is no reason to disturb these relationships.

Except for the upcoming fiscal year, this legislation does not authorize a specific amount of funding, authorizing only such sums as shall be necessary in future budget years. This is not intended as an open-ended authorization. Instead, it reflects a realization that the budget and appropriations processes will determine the level of funding for these programs. Because our legislation will be introduced prior to tranmission to the Congress of the President's 1982 budget, I reserve the right to vote for a level of funding that may differ from the $3.8 billion authorized for fiscal year 1983.

The Senate Subcommittee on Employment and the House Subcommittee on Employment Opportunities will conduct extensive hearings on this and other employment and training proposals in the next few months. I look forward to hearing the comments and analysis from persons interested in employment and training programs. Working together, I am confident that we can enact legislation that will improve the employment prospects of millions of Americans.●

TITLE I—STATE JOB TRAINING PROGRAM

ALLOTMENT; ALLOCATION

SEC. 101. (a)(1) Seven percent of the amount appropriated pursuant to section 301(a) for each fiscal year shall be allotted to the States in the same manner as provided in subsection (b)(2) and (3). The amount allotted under this paragraph shall be available to the Governor of each State.

(2)(A) Not more than 10 percent of the amount allotted under paragraph (1) of this subsection to each State may be used for the costs of auditing activities and other statewide administrative activities under sections 304 and 305.

(B) The remainder of the amount allotted under paragraph (1) of this subsection to each State shall be used for programs and activities pursuant to section 105(e).

(b)(1) The remainder of the amount appropriated pursuant to section 301(a) for each fiscal year after complying with the set-aside under section 302(a), relating to national programs, and subsection (a) of this section shall be allotted in accordance with this subsection.

(2) Two percent of the amount allotted under this subsection for each fiscal year shall be allotted to the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, and not more than $5,000,000 among Guam, the Virgin Islands, American Samoa, the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, and the Northern Mariana Islands.

(3) Of the remainder of the amount allotted under this subsection for each fiscal year—

(A) 50 percent shall be allotted on the basis of the relative number of long-term unemployed persons within the State compared to the total number of long-term unemployed persons in all States; and

(B) 50 percent shall be allotted on the basis of the relative number of economically disadvantaged persons who are in the labor force within the State compared to the total number of economically disadvantaged persons who are in the labor force in all States.

(4) For the purpose of paragraph (3)—

(A) the term "State" does not include the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, Guam, the Virgin Islands, American Samoa, the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, and the Northern Mariana Islands; and

(B) The term "long-term unemployed persons" means the average number of persons who have been unemployed for at least 15 weeks for the most recent two-year period preceding the year for which the determination is made.

(c)(1) The sum allotted under subsection (b) to each State shall be allocated by the Secretary among service delivery areas within the State on the basis of the relative number of economically disadvantaged persons who are in the labor force in each service delivery area within the State compared to the total number of such persons within the State.

(2) The substate allocations required by this subsection shall be made on the basis of 1980 Census data until the Governor of the State and the Secretary of Labor agree that there is more recent statistical data for making the substate allocations which is sufficiently reliable to make such allocations.

SERVICE DELIVERY AREA

SEC. 102. (a) A service delivery area is any area served in fiscal year 1982 by a prime sponsor established under the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act, except that, with respect to any area for which the State was a prime sponsor, the Governor may designate subdivisions of the State as service delivery areas within the State if services under that Act were planned or administered for such subdivisions. Service delivery areas established under this subsection shall remain in effect until they are changed in accordance with subsection (b) of this section.

(b)(1) The Governor may propose tentative revisions in service delivery areas for the State if he determines that the revised area will—

(A) promote substantially more effective delivery of job training services;

(B) have available an effective agency for administering job training services; and

(C)(i) be more consistent with labor market or Standard Metropolitan Statistical Area boundaries than the prior area but the requirement of this clause shall not be construed to require the Governor to designate an entire labor market area; or

(ii) be more consistent with existing areas in which related services are provided under other State or Federal programs.

(2) Any tentative revisions proposed by the Governor under paragraph (1) shall include a written description of the reasons therefor.

(3) After the Governor has proposed such tentative areas, chief elected officials of units of general local government may petition to have areas designated as service delivery areas either as proposed by the Governor or with modifications. Such petitions shall be jointly filed by the units of general local government and the private industry council, except that separate petitions may be filed if no agreement can be reached between the chief elected officials and the private industry council. Such petitions shall include the views of other chief elected officials and private industry councils in the affected areas and shall include any agreements made concerning planning or administration of programs in the proposed service delivery area.

(4) The Governor shall review each petition and may approve each petition, with or without modification. The Governor shall approve any petition that includes the agreement of both the private industry councils and chief elected officials of the affected interim service delivery area, unless he determines, for good cause shown, that such agreement will not carry out the provision of the Act. A disapproval under the preceding sentence of the Governor may be appealed to the Secretary of Labor.

(5) The Governor shall approve any petition from a unit of general local government with a population of 250,000 or more to be a service delivery area for that unit of government unless (A) the private industry council does not concur, and (B) the Governor makes specific findings of fact why inclusion of that unit of local government in a larger area will promote the purposes of this act either because such area is needed to accommodate labor market factors or to coordinate with other related service delivery areas. If the Governor and the unit of general local government cannot reach agreement, the dispute resolution provisions of section 103(e)(3)(C) shall apply.

(c) No change in a service delivery area may be made later than 4 months before the beginning of a program year or within 2 years of a previous revision.

(d) Each Governor shall report to the Secretary annually on changes in service delivery areas within the State made during the year. If interim areas established under subsection (a) remain in effect, the Governor shall include in the report the reasons for each area why change was not made.

PLANNING THE PROGRAM

SEC. 103. (a) A program plan shall be prepared in accordance with provisions of subsection (c) for any program year that begins more than 90 days after the certification of a private industry council under subsection (b). Until the beginning of such program year, a program plan shall be prepared by the prime sponsor established under the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act.

(b)(1) There shall be a private industry council for every service delivery area to be selected in accordance with this subsection. Each council shall consist of—

(A) representatives of private industry, who shall constitute a majority of the membership of the council; and

(B) representatives of units of general local government, educational agencies, organized labor, community-based organizations, economic development agencies, and the Employment Service.

(2)(A) Representatives of private industry shall be owners of business concerns, chief executives or chief operating officers of for-profit organizations, or other officers of business concerns who have or have had profit and loss responsibility for an autonomous part of a business.

(B) Private industry representatives on the council shall be selected from among individuals nominated by general purpose business organizations operating within the area and shall include representation from small business. For the purpose of this subparagraph, the term "general purpose business organizations" means organizations which admit to membership any for-profit business operating within the geographic area.

(C) The chief elected officials of units of general local governments within the service delivery area shall appoint members to the council from the individuals so nominated in accordance with an agreement entered into by the units of general local government within the service delivery area. In the absence of such an agreement, the appointment shall be made by such officials, in proportion that the economically disadvantaged population of the unit of general local government has to the total economically disadvantaged population of the service delivery area. Any fractional appointments shall be allocated to the largest unit of government. Members may be replaced only with the concurrence of the nominating and appointing authorities in accordance with the provisions of this paragraph or in accordance with the bylaws of the private industry council.

(3) The remaining representatives on the council shall be selected by agreement between chief elected officials of units of general local government from individuals recommended by interested organizations. If agreement cannot be reached, other representatives shall be selected by the Governor on the basis of such recommendations.

(4) The number of members of the council shall be determined by agreement among the chief elected officials of units of general local government and, in the absence of such agreement, by the Governor.

(5) The Governor shall certify a private industry council when he determines that its composition and appointments are consistent with the provisions of this subsection. Such certification shall be made or denied within 30 days after the date on which a list of members is submitted to the Governor.

(6) In determining the population of a unit of general local government, for the purpose of paragraph (2) (C), there shall be excluded the population of any general local government over 50,000 population within the boundaries of any other such unit. The population of a unit of general local government shall not be counted if it has population under 50,000 and is included in the boundaries of a larger general unit of local government.

(c) When the private industry council is certified by the Governor, the council shall—

(1) prepare the program plan for the service delivery area; and

(2) certify training institutions and other agencies pursuant to section 105(d).

In order to carry out its functions under this subsection, the council may hire such staff and exercise such other powers as may be necessary to prepare the plan.

(d) Each program plan shall contain—

(1) a description of services and programs to be furnished within the service delivery area;

(2) procedures for identifying and selecting participants;

(3) procedures for selecting service providers;

(4) the budget for the program year in such detail as the private industry council determines necessary, including any proposed expenditures for the succeeding program years;

(5) expected performance accomplishments and a comparison with the performance of the previous program year; and

(6) an annual report of the activities conducted in the service delivery area in the previous program year.

(e)(1) Each private industry council shall publish a proposed plan 120 days before the beginning of a program year and provide interested parties an opportunity for comment. The council may hire a hearing examiner to hold hearings if necessary. The final plan shall be published not later than 80 days before the program year and shall be submitted to the Governor jointly by the private industry council and the chief elected official in the service delivery area, or, if there is more than one such official in the area by their designated representative. If such official or representative does not agree with all or any part of the plan, the private industry council shall reconsider the plan, in whole or in part. If the disagreement cannot be resolved after mediation by the Governor, the proposed plan together with proposed revisions shall be presented to the Governor for resolution.

(2) The Governor shall approve the plan unless—

(A) the Governor finds for specific reasons that the plan will not meet performance criteria,

(B) the Governor determines that the proposed program will not serve the economically disadvantaged, or

(C) the plan does not provide corrective measures for deficiencies found in audits or other assessments from previous years.

(3)(A) The Governor shall disapprove the plan if he finds that it will not provide equality of access to all segments of the disadvantaged community in the area.

(B) Any disapproval by the Governor shall be made within 30 days after the date that the plan is submitted.

(C) If after disapproval by the Governor, the matter cannot be resolved within 30 days, the matters in dispute shall be submitted to the Secretary of Labor for arbitration. The Secretary shall decide the matters in dispute within 30 days after receiving the submission under this subparagraph.

PROGRAM ADMINISTRATION

SEC. 104. (a) Fund allocated for use in any service delivery area shall be available to the entity qualifying as the prime sponsor for that area until the Governor takes action pursuant to subsection (b), if the prime sponsor agrees to administer the funds received in accordance with a plan approved under section 103. If the prime sponsor is not willing to enter into such agreement, the funds shall be administered by an entity jointly agreed to by the private industry council certified under section 103 and the Governor, and if there is no council certified under section 103, by an entity selected by the Governor.

(b)(1) The private industry council and the chief elected official in the service delivery area or their designated representative if there is more than one such official in the area may jointly apply to the Governor to have the private industry council designated as the recipient and administrator of funds allocated for use in that area. The designation shall be made if the Governor determines that—

(A) the private industry council will have the administrative capacity to administer such funds;

(B) there are adequate safeguards for the protection of public funds received by the private industry council; and

(C) the private industry representatives on the private industry council are in favor of such designation.

(2) In any service delivery area in which no joint petition has been filed under paragraph (1), the Governor may designate the private industry council as the recipient and administrator of funds allocated for use in that area if he finds that the conditions in clauses (A), (B), and (C) of subsection (b)(1) are met, the majority of the members of the private industry council are in favor of such designation, and the administrator has not adequately carried out the requirements of this Act.

(3) No designation may be made by the Governor without notice to units of general local government in the service delivery area and an opportunity for such governments and other interested parties to be heard by the Governor or his designee.

(4) Not more than 20 percent of the funds available for any program year in any service delivery area may be used to pay for the costs of administration (including evaluation) in that area.

(5) Whenever a private industry council has been designated as the recipient and administrator of funds allocated under this title, at least 80 percent of the funds available in any fiscal year, excluding funds used for administration and on-the-job training programs, shall be subcontracted by the council.

(c)(1) In order to assist the Governor in making the decisions and determinations required under this title, the Governor may establish a State job training council. In order to be eligible for assistance under this title, at least one-fourth of the members of the council shall be business representatives of private industry councils, and the remainder shall be representatives of units of general local government, labor, the economically disadvantaged, and State or other public agencies as the Governor determines have a significant interest in the operation of job training programs in the State.

(2) The Council may—

(A) advise the Governor on his decisions under this title;

(B) review and evaluate, including making recommendations for changes in State or Federal legislation or operations, programs and policies related to job training and related programs; and

(C) conduct planning activities under section 105(e).

PROGRAM ELEMENTS

SEC. 105. (a) Funds allocated to service delivery areas under this Act may be used for—

(1) basic and remedial education, institutional and on-the-job training, counseling, occupational training, preparation for work, job search training and any other activity designed to prepare disadvantaged persons for and place them in employment;

(2) supportive service necessary to enable persons to participate in the program and to assist them in retaining employment;

(3) the wages of participants as employees of a public or private not-for-profit organization for a period of up to 6 weeks while such persons perform services for a private for-profit employer as part of a program to place the participant in regular employment with such employer;

(4) payments to private for-profit employers for on-the-job training, and such payments shall not exceed the costs to such employer of providing such training;

(5) reimbursement of participants for costs incurred in participating in programs, but such funds shall not be available for the payments of stipends or allowances; and

(6) employment generating activities to increase job opportunities for eligible persons in the area.

Costs under clause (4) may be determined by any reasonable method such as a percentage of wages paid, including a declining percentage related to the participant's increased productivity as the participant progresses through the training period. The restriction contained in clause (5) shall not preclude the payment of modest sums to persons who have successfully completed all or an identifiable part of a program or have special needs due to participation in long-term training.

(b)(1) An amount equal to at least the percentage of funds determined under paragraph (2) but not more than one and one-half times that percentage shall be available for any program year in any service delivery area to provide services to individuals under the age of 22.

(2) The percentage in paragraph (1) shall be 50 percent adjusted by the difference that the ratio of disadvantaged youth to disadvantaged adults in the service delivery area bears to that ratio for all States.

(c) A person shall be eligible to participate in a program conducted or assisted with funds allocated to a service delivery area under this Act only if the person is economically disadvantaged, except that not to exceed 10 percent of the participants may be individuals who are not economically disadvantaged if such individuals have encountered barriers to employment. Such individuals may include individuals who are physically handicapped, have limited English-speaking ability, are displaced homemakers, ex-offenders, alcoholics, or addicts or are workers identified under section 502.

(d)(1) In selecting agencies to deliver services within a service delivery area, prime consideration shall be given to the cost effectiveness of the agency in delivering comparable services based on past performance.

(2) No agency shall be used to provide occupational skills training unless the private industry council has certified that the level of skill provided is acceptable to employers in the area.

(e) Amounts available to Governors under section 101(a)(2)(B) may be used for—

(1) expenses of the State council, including evaluation of programs;

(2) technical assistance;

(3) developing linkages between programs funded under this Act and related programs and providing assistance to programs funded under this Act and related Federal or State legislation;

(6) developing and providing labor market and occupational information;

(7) developing a management information system compiling and analyzing reports from the system; and

(8) providing incentives for superior performances pursuant to section 303(e).

(f)(1) The Governor shall publish a proposed plan for uses of funds under subsection (e) 120 days before the beginning of the program year and provide opportunity for comment to interested parties. The Governor may hire a hearing examiner to hold hearings if necessary. The final plan shall be published 80 days before the beginning of the program year and shall be submitted to the Secretary.

(2)(A) The Secretary shall approve the plan within 30 days unless he finds, for good cause shown that the plan is inconsistent with the requirements of his title.

(B) Any disapproval by the Secretary shall be made within 30 days after the date that the plan is submitted to the Secretary.

(C) If after disapproval by the Secretary, the Governor and the Secretary cannot reach agreement within 30 days, the Governor may request a hearing on the record under subchapter II of Chapter 5 of title 5, United States Code.

TITLE II—NATIONAL JOB TRAINING PROGRAMS

PART A—NATIVE AMERICAN EMPLOYMENT TRAINING PROGRAMS

PURPOSE AND POLICY

SEC. 201. (a) The Congress finds that (1) serious unemployment and economic disadvantage exist among members of Indian, Alaskan Native, and Hawaiian native communities; (2) there is a compelling need for the establishment of comprehensive training and employment programs for members of those communities; and (3) such programs are essential to the reduction of economic disadvantage among individual members of those communities and to the advancement of economic and social development in these communities consistent with their goals and lifestyles.

(b) The Congress therefore declares that, because of the special relationship between the Federal Government and most of the individuals to be served by the provisions of this part, (1) such programs shall be administered at the national level; (2) such programs shall be available to federally recognized Indian tribes, bands, and groups and to other groups and individuals of Native American descent; and (3) such programs shall be administered in such a manner as to maximize the Federal commitment to support growth and development as determined by representatives of the communities and groups served by this part.

PROGRAM AUTHORIZED

SEC. 202. (a)(1)(A) In carrying out responsibilities under this part, the Secretary shall, wherever possible, utilize Indian tribes, bands, or groups on Federal or State reservations (including Alaska Native villages or groups as defined in the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act of December 18, 1971) and the Oklahoma Indians, having a governing body and such organizations as the Secretary determines will best serve Native Americans, for the provision of employment and training services under this section. PERFORMANCE CRITERIA

SEC. 303. (a) The Congress recognizes that training is an investment in human capital and not an expense. In order to determine whether that investment has been productive, the Congress finds that—

(1) it is essential that criteria for measuring the return on this investment be developed; and

(2) the basic return on the investment is to be measured by the increased earnings of participants and the reductions in cash welfare payments.

(b)(1) The basic measure of performance for adult training programs is the increase in earnings and reductions in cash welfare payments resulting from participation in the program. The Secretary shall prescribe standards to measure the results of participation in the program. The standards shall include provisions governing—

(A) the base period prior to program participation that will be used;

(B) a representative period after termination from the program that is a reasonable indicator of post-program earnings and income maintenance payments; and

(2) The Secretary shall prescribe standards relating gross program expenditures to total earnings gains and reductions in cash welfare payments to participants.

(3) Each Governor may prescribe variations in the standards prescribed under paragraph (2) based on specific economic factors in the State and in service delivery areas within the State.

(4) The Secretary shall prescribe variations in performance criteria for Native American and migrant and seasonal farmworker programs taking into account their special circumstances.

(f)(1) The Governor shall provide technical assistance to programs which do not meet performance criteria. If the failure to meet performance criteria persists for a second year, the Governor shall propose a reorganization plan. Such plan may restructure the private industry council, prohibit the use of designated delivery agencies or make such other changes as the Governor deems necessary to improve performance. The Governor may also propose the selection of an alternative administrator for the service delivery area.

(2) The alternate administrator may be a newly formed private industry council or an agency jointly selected by the Governor and the chief elected official of the largest unit of general local government in the service delivery area and approved by the Secretary.

(3) No change may be made under this subsection without an opportunity for a fair hearing before a hearing officer appointed by the Governor.

(b)(1) The Comptroller General of the United States shall, on a selective basis, evaluate the expenditures by the recipients of grants under this Act in order to assure that expenditures are consistent with the provisions of this Act and to determine the effectiveness of the recipient in accomplishing the purposes of this Act. The Comptroller General shall conduct the evaluations whenever he determines it necessary and he shall periodically report to the Congress on the findings of such evaluations.

(2) Nothing in this Act shall be deemed to relieve the Inspector General of the Department of Labor of his responsibilities under the Inspector General Act.

(3) For the purpose of evaluating and reviewing programs established or provided for by this Act, the Comptroller General shall have access to and the right to copy any books, accounts, records, correspondence, or other documents pertinent to such programs that are in the possession, custody, or control of the State, a private industry council established under section 103 of this Act, any recipient of funds under this Act, or any subgrantee or contractor of such recipients.

(c)(1) Every recipient shall repay to the United States amounts found not to have been expended in accordance with this Act. (2) For the purpose of this subsection, the term "recipient" includes both any entity receiving direct financial assistance from the United States and any entity receiving assistance through subgrants or contracts.

(3) Each recipient shall be liable to repay from funds other than funds received under this Act upon a determination that the misexpenditure of funds was due to willful disregard of the requirements of this Act, gross negligence, or failure to observe accepted standards of administration. No such finding shall be made except after notice and opportunity for a fair hearing.

REPORTS, RECORDKEEPING, AND INVESTIGATIONS

SEC. 305. (a) Recipients shall keep records that are sufficient to permit the preparation of reports required by this Act and to permit the tracing of funds to a level of expenditure adequate to insure that the funds have not been spent unlawfully.

(b)(1) The Secretary may investigate such facts, conditions, practices, or other matters which the Secretary finds necessary to determine whether any recipient of funds or any official of such recipient has violated any provision of this Act.

(2)(A) In order to evaluate compliance with the provisions of this Act, the Secretary shall conduct, in several States, in each fiscal year investigations of the use of funds received by recipients under this Act.

(B) In order to insure compliance with the provisions of this Act, the Comptroller General of the United States may conduct investigations of the use of funds received under this Act by any recipient.

(3) In conducting any investigation under this Act, the Secretary or the Comptroller General of the United States may not request any information not readily available to such recipient.

(c) Each State receiving funds under this Act shall—

(b)(1) Any contract negotiated under subsection (a) may be submitted to the Director of the Office of Federal Contract Compliance, Department of Labor, and, if approved by the Director, shall be presumptive evidence of the good faith of the contractor in dealing with the underutilization to which it was addressed, if the underutilization as described in the contract is an accurate representation of the facts.

(2) Whenever the contract negotiated under subsection (a) is submitted to, but neither approved nor disapproved by the director the contract may be used as evidence of good faith of the contractor in meeting any underutilization accurately described in the contract, if the commitment of funds or other resources of the contractor was deemed sufficient either in relation to the size of its contract award from the Federal Government or the extent of the underutilization.

(3) The Director of the Office of Federal Contract Compliance, Department of Labor, may by rule prescribe limitations, by geographical area, industry, size of procurement, or other criteria, on the types or numbers of contracts authorized under subsection (a) that may be submitted to the office.

TRAINING FOR JOBS ACT

BRIEF SUMMARY

The Training for Jobs Act is a training program for the economically disadvantaged and will replace the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act which expires in September 1982. The Act is designed to encourage business, state and local governments to work together to train and place these workers in permanent private sector jobs.

The Training for Jobs Act provides formula grants to the States with suballocations to "service delivery areas." Training programs in these areas will be designed by a private industry council in coordination with local elected officials. The Councils, appointed by the chief local elected officials, will have a majority of business members and include representatives from local government, organized labor, education, community based groups, economic development agencies and the Employment Service. Funds are available for training the economically disadvantaged and others with significant barriers to employment. Programs will be evaluated under performance standards that measure earnings gains and welfare payment reductions. At least 50% of the funds are reserved for programs for youth under 22.

The bill includes a separate retraining program for dislocated workers who have no reasonable prospect of returning to their employment. The bill retains the current Jobs Corps program.

In addition, the bill promotes coordination between the training program and the Employment Service program by giving the private industry council planning authority over the local employment service operations.

AUTHORIZATION

The bill provides for authorization of appropriations for an indefinite period with $3.8 billion authorized for the basic program in fiscal year 1983 and such sums thereafter. An additional $100,000,000 is authorized for the program for dislocated workers. The appropriation for the basic program is divided as follows: 22% for programs administered by the Secretary of Labor including the Job Corps, Indian Programs, Migrant Programs, and Program Administration, 7% for Governors for Statewide Programs and 71% for States and Suballocation to Service delivery areas.

THE DELIVERY SYSTEM

A private industry council (PIC) will plan the training program within each service delivery area. The plan will be submitted to the Governors by the PIC and local elected officials. The PIC will have a majority of private industry representatives and the remainder will be from general local government, educational agencies, organized labor, community based organizations, economic development agencies and the Employment Service. Private industry membership must include representation from small business.

SERVICE DELIVERY AREA

The Governor may propose to change the current delivery areas. Local governments and PICs may then petition for designation of specific areas. The Governor will accept those petitions filed jointly by local governments and PICs and those filed by local governments with more than 250,000 population, unless he finds that they are inconsistent with the purposes of the Act. Disputes may be submitted to the Secretary of Labor for resolution.

GRANT ADMINISTRATION

The program will continue to be operated by the current administrator but the Governor may transfer administration to the PIC if (1) the PIC and the local elected officials petition for the change or (2) the Governor determines the PIC has the ability to administer the program and the PIC members (including business members) are in favor of taking over the administration and the current administrator is not adequately carrying out the requirements of the Act.

PROGRAM ELEMENTS

Funds may be used for basic and remedial education, institutional and on-the-job training, counseling, occupational training, preparation for work, job search training and other activities designed to prepare disadvantaged for and place them in unsubsidized jobs.

Funds must be used for training related activities; funds may not be used to pay participant stipends or allowances. Modest sums may be paid to those with special needs due to participation in long-term training. Between 50% to 75% of the funds must be used to provide services to persons under 22 years of age.

ELIGIBILITY

Persons eligible include the economically disadvantaged, defined as having an income no more than 70% of the BLS lower living income level for the prior six months, or persons receiving cash welfare or persons receiving food stamps. 10% of the participants may be persons not meeting these income standards but having other employment barriers.

PERFORMANCE STANDARDS

The basic measure of performance for adult programs is the increase in earnings and reductions in cash welfare payments resulting from participation in the program. Performance criteria for youth will be based on employment competencies acquired and on placements and retention in employment. Programs failing to meet performance standards for two years, after receiving technical assistance, must be reorganized or replaced.

GOVERNORS' PROGRAMS

Funds are made available to the Governor to be used for a number of statewide programs including programs for dislocated workers. 10% of these funds must be used for performance bonuses, including bonus for serving the hard to serve.

OTHER PROVISIONS

The States have oversight responsiblity for funds received within the state, including the responsibility for establishing fiscal control and fund accounting procedures in accordance with guidance from OMB and for auditing recipients at least once every two years.

NATIONAL PROGRAMS

Title IV B of the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act authorizing the Job Corps Program is retained—unamended. Training programs for Indians and Migrants are retained.

TITLE V DISLOCATED WORKER PROGRAM

$100,000,000 is authorized to be appropriated for Fiscal Year 1983 and "Such Sums as may be necessary" thereafter for a program to identify displaced workers, job opportunities and training available and then match the worker with the training and ultimately with the job. Funds provided under the provisions of this title may be used to pay 50 percent of the cost of the program, the remaining 50 percent must consist of non-federal matching.

TITLE VI COORDINATION OF JOB TRAINING ACTIVITIES

Provisions allow for the PIC to be used for planning or advising on other training related federal programs. Also, Governors may combine Advisory Councils whose functions relate to employment or training. State agencies may contract with other State agencies to perform job training or related programs.

AMENDMENTS TO THE WAGNER-PEYSER ACT

Provisions provide for a formula for distribution of funds to States and to Service Delivery Areas and provide for PICs to plan for local Employment Service operations in a service delivery area.

If chief local elected official(s) and PIC agree, such petitions shall be jointly filed; if not, separate petitions responding to the Governors proposal may be filed.

Governor must review each petition, and may approve them, with or without modification Governor shall not disapprove any petition that is jointly filed by the PICs and chief local elected officials of the affected interim service delivery area unless he determines that such agreement would not carry out the purposes of the Act. Such a ruling may be appealed to the Secretary of Labor.

Governors must report to the Secretary annually on any changes made to service delivery areas.

The PIC is formally constituted only after the Governor certifies it as meeting all statutory requirements.

The PIC is responsible for preparing the plan for the service delivery area and may hire staff for this function.

PIC must publish the program plan 120 days before the program year begins and provide opportunity to comment; final plan must be published 80 days before the year starts. If chief local elected officials disagree with all or part of the plan, the PIC shall reconsider. Plan is jointly submitted by the PIC and the chief local elected officials to the Governor.

If after mediation by the Governor the disagreement is not resolved, the proposed plan and the proposed revisions will be submitted to the Governor for decision.

Governor approves or disapproves the plan. If after disapproval by the Governor, the matter cannot be resolved, it shall be submitted to the Secretary of Labor for arbitration.

Administering the Program in SDA's: Funds allocated to a service delivery area will be available to the prime sponsor for that area unless the Governor designates the PIC as administrator. The prime sponsor must agree to administer the program in accordance with the approved plan. If it is not willing to enter into such an agreement the funds shall be administered by an entity jointly agreed to by the private industry council and the Governor. If no council is certified, the entity is selected by the Governor.

The PIC and the chief elected official(s) in the SDA may petition jointly to the Governor to have the PIC designated as recipient and administrator of the program in their area.

The Governor may then designate the PIC as the recipient and administrator of funds if the private industry representatives on the PIC are in favor of such designation and if in the Governors determination the PIC has the administrative capacity to administer such funds as well as the adequate safeguards for protection of such funds.

If such joint petition has not been filed the Governor can designate the PIC as recipient and administrator if the administrative capacity and safeguard of funds provisions are met and the majority of the PIC are in favor of such designation and the administrator has not adequately carried out the requirements of the Act. Any such designation must provide the opportunity for all service delivery area governments to comment.

Not more than 20 percent of the funds available to any service delivery area for any year may be used for administration (including evaluation).

Whenever a PIC has been designated as administrator of the funds, at least 80 percent of the funds available, excluding funds used for administration and on-the-job training, must be subcontracted by the PIC.

Use of Funds Allocated to Service Delivery Areas: Funds may be used for basic and remedial education, institutional and on-the-job training, counseling, occupational training, preparation for work, job search training, other activities designed to prepare disadvantaged persons for and place them in unsubsidized jobs, and support services.

Funds may be used to reimburse participants for costs incurred while participating in the program.

Funds may be used to pay modest bonuses to participants successfully completing all or an identifiable part of a program or having special needs due to participation in long term training.

Youth Programs (under age 22): At least 50 percent but not more than 75 percent of the funds available in any service delivery area in any program year shall be used to provide services to youth. These percentages are to be adjusted by the difference that the ratio of disadvantaged youth to disadvantaged adults in the service delivery area bears to that ratio for all states.

Service Delivery Agents: In selecting agencies to deliver services within a service delivery area, prime consideration must be given to the cost-effectiveness of the agency in delivering comparable services based on past performance.

No agency may be used to provide occupational skills training unless the private industry council has certified that the level of skill provided is acceptable to employers in the area.

Performance Standards: Adults: The basic measure of performance for adult programs is the increase in earnings and reductions in cash welfare payments resulting from participation in the program.

The Governor may prescribe variations in the standards based on specific economic factors in the local service delivery areas and in the State.

Youth: Performance criteria for youth may be locally developed by the administrator of funds in the service delivery area based on employment competencies recognized by the private industry council and on placement and retention in employment.

Such plan may restructure the private industry council, prohibit the use of designated delivery agencies or make such other changes as the Governor deems necessary to improve performance. The Governor may also propose the selection of an alternative administrator for the service delivery area. Such changes can be made only with an opportunity for a fair hearing.

Variations in performance criteria are to be prescribed by the Secretary for Native American and Migrant and Seasonal Farmworker Programs taking into account their special circumstances.

Use of Funds—State Programs and Activities: Amounts available to the Governor, (the 7 percent) can be used for expenses of the State Job Training Council, program evaluation, technical assistance, developing linkages between programs under this Act and related programs, providing assistance to jointly funded programs, providing programs for offenders and exoffenders and other persons whom the Governor determines requires special assistance, providing programs for workers with no reasonable prospect of returning to the occupation or industry from which they have been laid off, developing and providing labor market and occupational information, developing a management information system and compiling and analyzing reports. Mandatory use of 10 percent of funds for performance bonuses, including bonus for serving the hard to serve.

Governor must submit a plan for the use of these funds to the Secretary of Labor who will approve it unless it fails to meet statutory requirements. If disapproved, the Governor may request a hearing on the record.

Limit of 10 percent of the amount allotted may be used for the costs of administrative activities such as auditing and reporting.

The Comptroller General must, on a selective basis review the expenditures of funds by recipients to assure compliance with the requirements and purposes of the Act and must report periodically to the Congress on the finding of their evaluations.

The Department of Labor Inspector General maintains an oversight role.

Such amounts can be deducted from any other amount to which the recipient is or may be entitled, unless the mis-expenditure is due to willful disregard, gross negligence, or failure to observe accepted standards of administration.

Recipients charged with mis-expenditures due to willful disregard of statutory requirements, gross negligence or failure to observe accepted administrative standards will be required to repay the amounts with funds other than funds provided under this Act; this provision applies both to entities receiving direct financial assistance from the U.S. and those receiving assistance through subgrants for contracts.

Reports and Recordkeeping and Investigations: Recipients must keep records that are sufficient to permit the preparation of reports required by this Act and to permit the tracing of funds to a level of expenditure adequate to insure that the funds have not been spent unlawfully.

The Secretary of Labor and the U.S. Comptroller General may conduct investigations into the use of funds.

In conducting any investigation, neither the Secretary nor the Comptroller General may request any information not readily available to the recipient.

States must report the details of their operations and expenditures as prescribed by the Secretary of Labor.

States shall determine whether training opportunities for such employment opportunities exist or could be provided within the area.

When training opportunities are identified, information concerning them is to be made available to workers.

The Secretary is authorized to reallocate any amounts he determines a State cannot use within a reasonable time frame.

Program Elements: Funds may be used for but are not limited to job search assistance, job development, training in jobs skills for which demand exceeds supply, support services, relocation assistance, and programs conducted in cooperation with employers or labor organizations to provide early intervention in the event of plant closures.

AFGHANISTAN DAY

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I send to the desk a joint resolution to authorize and request the President to issue a proclamation designating March 21, 1982, as Afghanistan Day to commemorate the struggle of the people of Afghanistan against the occupation of their country by Soviet forces.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joing resolution will be received and appropriately referred.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the joint resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 142

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

Whereas Afghanistan, more than two years after the Soviet invasion, remains a nation occupied and terrorized by over 80,000 Soviet troops;

Whereas the continued Soviet occupation of Afghanistan is causing enormous suffering among the people of Afghanistan, as well as the deprivation of their basic right of national sovereignty;

Whereas over 2.5 million people of Afghanistan, constituting more than 15 percent of the country's population, have fled the Soviet occupation and are now refugees in Pakistan and other neighboring countries;

Whereas the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan undermines the spirit and intention of the Declaration of Principles of the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, which the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics signed at Helsinki in 1975;

Whereas the puppet regime of Babrak Karmal, installed and maintained by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, has denied the people of Afghanistan their right to self-determination, in violation of the United Nations Charter;

Whereas the undaunted resistance of the Afghan freedom fighters against the Soviet occupational forces is an inspiration to the free world;

Whereas the United Nations General Assembly passed a resolution on November 18, 1981, calling for "the immediate withdrawal of the foreign troops from Afghanistan";

Whereas the people of Afghanistan observe March 21 as the start of each new year and as a symbol of the nation's rebirth; and

Whereas the European Parliament has declared its intention to commemorate March 21, 1982, as Afghanistan Day: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United states of America in Congress assembled, That the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation designating March 21, 1982, as Afghanistan Day, and calling upon the people of the United States to observe such day with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I am introducing this joint resolution today calling for the proclamation of March 21, 1982, as Afghanistan Day, this is the result of the coordinated efforts of the State Department and U.S. Representative ELLIOT LEVITAS from the State of Georgia.

Joining me as original cosponsors of this joint resolution are Senator PERCY, Senator PELL, Senator BOSCHWITZ, and Senator ZORINSKY.

The origin of this resolution occurred at the North Atlantic Assembly meeting in October when, at the request of the State Department, Representative LEVITAS and I conferred with certain Representatives of the European Parliaments on the subject of a unified approach to have Afghanistan Day proclaimed as March 21, 1982. March 21 was selected because that is the day of the Afghanistan New Year.

The goal is to have solidarity among nations of the world to the extent that that is possible, with special emphasis on the Western powers. Already Afghanistan Day has been memorialized by the European community and by a favorable United Nations resolution.

Over 2 years have passed since the historic and brutal invasion of Afghanistan by the Soviet Union on December 24, 1979. The bloody invasion and the installation and maintenance of the regime of Babrak Karmal—as well as the subsequent violence and hardship which have followed—represent blatant violations of international law and the United Nations Charter. The invasion and occupation of Afghanistan set into stark relief the cruel realities of Soviet aggression.

While there may be debates and arguments about the extent of the Soviet proxy in the Polish situation, or the extent of Soviet involvement in El Salvador, or the extent of Soviet involvement in Angola, or elsewhere, there can be no doubt about the fact of Soviet aggression in Afghanistan. In this case, there is the harsh reality of Soviet aggression. This resolution is an effort to have unified action by the European Community and by the United Nations, as well as by the United States.

Through the installation of over 80,000 troops and active use of terrorist tactics, the Soviet Union has—for over 2 long years—maintained a death grip on Afghanistan.

Afghanistan Day represents more than an empty gesture: it is a day of unity to rally against Soviet aggression and express admiration for the Afghan freedom fighters. Afghanistan Day sends a strong message to the Soviet Union which has so relentlessly oppressed the people of Afghanistan. Afghanistan Day provides inspiration to the tireless and courageous Afghan freedom fighters. Afghanistan Day conveys to the international community the depth of American concern for the fates of developing nations struggling to assert their independence.

Soviet brutality has taken a great toll on Afghanistan. We cannot allow that fact, however tragic, to immobilize the world community. We cannot allow the brutality of Soviet aggression to obscure the strength and courage of the Afghan freedom fighters.

It is the Afghan freedom fighters determination to make their nation free and independent that enables the resistance to continue. With every intensification of Soviet military repression, the Afghan freedom fighters have only grown more tenacious.

At a time when European-American relations are showing signs of strain, it is important to recognize the consensus which exists within the Western alliance regarding Afghanistan and the need to respond to Soviet aggression. The unification of the Western world for the cause of Afghanistan's independence gives Afghanistan Day a special significance.

I recognized how many important concerns and interest the United States shares with her European allies through my participation in the North Atlantic Assembly meetings this past October. During the deliberations of the North Atlantic Assembly, I was particularly proud to take an active role in the passage of a resolution condemning the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan.

On December 21, 1981, the European Parliament, representing the European community, passed their own resolution commemorating March 21, 1982, as Afghanistan Day. It is entirely fitting that the U.S. Congress join the European initiative. With the additional support of Third-World countries, March 21, 1982, will become a day to demonstrate international unity and global support for the people of Afghanistan.

President Reagan echoed the call of the European Parliament in his state of the Union address when he urged the American people—and all peace-loving people—"to join together on those days, to raise their voices, to speak and pray for freedom."

I sincerely hope that you will join us in our efforts to focus public attention on the Afghan struggle by cosponsoring the joint resolution.

March 21, 1982—Afghanistan Day—should not be a day of despair but, rather, a day of hope: hope that continued international protest, combined with the devoted efforts of the afghan freedom fighters, will insure the establishment of a free and independent Afghanistan.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I am pleased to join Senators SPECTER, PERCY, ZORINSKY, and BOSCHWITZ in sponsoring the resolution to designate March 21, 1982, as Afghanistan Day.

More than 2 years ago, on Christmas Day, Soviet forces moved into Afghanistan beginning a brutal war against the people of that country.

Contrary to Soviet expectations, subjugating Afghanistan proved an elusive goal. Today the Soviets exercise effective control over only the capital, their own garrisons, and intermittently over some supply routes.

The Afghan freedom fighters, in spite of internal divisions, now control most of the countryside, have a functioning administration in some provinces, and have demonstrated their ability to strike at will.

That a backward nation of 17 million could so effectively stymie one of the most advanced and powerful military forces in history is a remarkable testament to the heroism of the Afghan freedom fighters.

In our admiration of the determination of the people of Afghanistan to protect their freedom, we must not lose sight of the terrible price the Afghan people have paid. Soviet airplanes have strafed, bombed, and dropped napalm on Afghan villages, killing indiscriminately men, women, and children.

Soviet search and destroy missions have blown up villages, massacred the inhabitants, and burned crops in an effort to deny food and shelter to the resistance. The Afghan landscape is today littered with the antipersonnel mines dropped by Soviet aircraft.

To escape the hell that is today Afghanistan, some 2,500,000 Afghans, mostly women and children, have fled to neighboring Pakistan.

The resolution we are introducing today is one way of expressing our solidarity, as a nation, with the people of Afghanistan and with their heroic struggle.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I might have the time originally set aside for the Senator from Texas (Mr. BENTSEN).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EL SALVADOR

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, last Thursday, to the astonishment of many Americans who have followed closely the tragic conflict in El Salvador, the President formally notified the Congress that continuing progress is being made in implementing political and economic reforms in El Salvador and the Duarte government was sincerely committed to ending abuses of civil and human rights. The President's determination coincided with evidence that the reign of murder, rape, and human abuse continues unabated in the country, and that the insurgency has intensified its military campaign against the government forces. In light of these disturbing developments, and in the anticipation of a White House request to increase military and economic aid to El Salvador by as much as $100 million in this fiscal year alone, I have sent a letter to the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Subcommittee on Foreign Operations requesting oversight hearings on our policy toward El Salvador.

Like all other Senators, I am mindful of the challenges posed by Soviet and Cuban policies to our vital interest in Latin America.

I might say that I feel that the Soviet Union and Cuba have been irresponsible in their activities in Latin America. At the same time, there is incontrovertible evidence that the very objectives so critical to stability in El Salvador—vindication of human rights, social reform, and economic progress for all of El Salvadorans, are being subverted by elements identified with the government.

Assurances freely given last year about protecting helpless civilians from the excesses of government troops have been overturned by frequent reports, some of them clearly accurate, of continued massacres at the hands of the military. Even as the administration repeats earlier claims that elections scheduled March 28 will mark a new era in El Salvador, our own Ambassador there is quoted as stating that "no alternative" may exist to seeking a military victory over the rebels.

Meanwhile, as many as a thousand El Salvandoran citizens are killed each month, and ambitious and laudable land reform program, sponsored by the Duarte regime, has been obstructed by the government's own troops. Despite generous U.S. military assistance and a string of proclamations that insurgent forces had been thrown on the defensive, we hear that half the country's air force capability has been destroyed in a single bold attack. Prospects that an impartial and genuine popular verdict can be extracted from next month's election grow ever more dim. Fears of an ever-expanding bloodbath grow even more real.

Our own policy over the past year raises serious questions about our objectives and our methods. Last winter the administration threatened "to go to the source" of aggression in Central America, but a white paper designed to substantiate Cuban and Nicaraguan involvement was at least partially compromised by flawed evidence.

I might say, since having heard of the white paper, both as a member of the Appropriations Committee and as a member of the Intelligence Committee, it was very clear that even those who had written the white paper did their best to back off of it almost as soon as it was presented.

The administration has pledged to press vigorously for a wide range of reforms, but it appears we have failed to apply all the leverage at our disposal. The war, we were told, had been won on the battlefield by virtue of $25 million in U.S. military assistance extended last year, but now our own experts do not know which side is winning.

Under these unsettling conditions the Congress will shortly be asked to expand dramatically the American financial commitment to El Salvador, in part to defray rapidly escalating military requirements, in part to sustain a war-battered economy, in part to begin a program of reconstruction even as the Duarte regime's capacity to control events weakens steadily.

For this year, the bill is expected to rise from $135 million to $235 million. The current forecast for next year is reported to be close to $300 million. Funds for all this must be drawn from allocations for other countries, including several other Central American countries where signs of insurgent activity are proliferating.

In this context, confidence in the administration's policy in El Salvador cannot easily be sustained. Oversight hearings constitute appropriate and indeed indispensable next step in assessing our policy toward El Salvador.

Mr. President, I hope that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and the chairman of the appropriate subcommittee will have such oversight hearings. I think it is absolutely essential that we know where these tax dollars are being spent.

Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of the time allotted to me.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, there will now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business.

S. 1394, THE SECRET SERVICE REFORM ACT

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I am pleased to ask unanimous consent that the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, Senator KENNEDY, be added as a cosponsor of S. 1394—the Secret Service Reform Act of 1981.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I am particularly honored to have the distinguished senior Senator from Massachusetts as a cosponsor of this bill. I want to quickly point out to my colleagues in the Senate, however, that the Senator has agreed to cosponsor this important legislation with reservations about the provision in the bill which would grant a Freedom of Information Act exemption to the Secret Service. I wanted to make that point abundantly clear from the start.

Nevertheless, the support of the Senator from Massachusetts for the Secret Service Reform Act is a positive signal that the time has come to provide the Secret Service with the necessary tools to do their essential job at a time when terrorism and the threat of assassination to our top public officials and international leaders is epidemic. We need only go back to that tragic day this past March when an attempt was made on the life of our President at the Washington Hilton to realize that without the skill and courage of our Secret Service men and women, we may have faced yet another deeper tragedy.

So, Mr. President, the cosponsorship of the Senator from Massachusetts who has faced the cruel, personal tragedy of such senseless attacks on members of his own family, should send a message to my colleagues in the Senate that the time has come to provide the Secret Service with the tools necessary to carry out its critical protective and investigative functions.

RESELL AMERICA TO AMERICANS

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, Justice of the Peace Ronald D. Johnson recently submitted a very novel and interesting idea that I am passing on to my colleagues for their thoughts and considerations in the hopes that we might implement these ideas and resell ourselves on our country. Justice of the Peace Johnson's ideas are:

As a nation we have tried to legislate those rights for our citizens, utilizing our laws to force compliance on the part of each citizen. If our Nation is to survive the challenges facing us as a nation, we must revert back to the melting pot concept and resell America to Americans. Each one must teach one, and it must be done voluntarily—by each of us.

For that reason it is proposed that the President of the United States appoint an Ambassador to America who will recruit and direct a volunteer group of bipartisan Americans to begin to resell America to our people.

The Government will be asked to underwrite the expense only for the program that will utilize the assistance of our congressional, State, and local officials, churches, as well as the VFW, Elks, Moose, and other patriotic and civic organizations to sponsor education and informational activities year round and assist in coordinating national holiday observances such as the Fourth of July, Veterans Day, Flag Day, and National Patriotism Week. In addition to those holidays the Ambassador will seek to involve all Americans in the recognition of cultural observances such as Cinco De Mayo, Black History Week, Italian, Polish, and other ethnic observances.

I believe that Judge Johnson has some very good ideas, ones that each of us should consider.

THE ECONOMIC AND DEFENSE POLICIES OF JAPAN

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I rise to share with the Senate my thoughts regarding a speech by a former colleague, a dear friend, and a great American, the former Senator from Arizona, Senator Paul Fannin. Senator Fannin has spoken recently on a topic that is increasingly becoming a grave national concern in this country. That subject is the economic and defense policies of the Government of Japan. He has spoken with great eloquence, and I agree with many of the points that he has made in that speech.

One of these points is that the current defense spending level by the Government of Japan is minuscule in comparison with the gross national product (GNP) of Japan. As a result, we in the United States continue to carry an extremely large portion of the heavy burden of the defense of that country.

I share Senator Fannin's concerns. I, too, wish to see some significant movement on the part of the Government of Japan toward carrying a larger part of the common defense burden. Furthermore, the funds that could potentially be used by Japan for defense are being used to subsidize the Japanese industry in its invasion of our markets. The Japanese have dominated the electronics and automobile markets and they are on their way to become world leaders in the steel and shipbuilding industries. At the same time, the Japanese impose trade restrictions that make it difficult for our products to compete fairly with their products in Japan.

It is of vital importance to the relationship between our country and Japan that the Japanese Government move significantly in two areas: One, to reduce trade restrictions on American products; and, two, to increase their defense spending significantly, and by that I mean to spend at a level well beyond that of 1 percent of GNP.

Mr. President, the speech by Senator Paul Fannin contains numerous other good points, and I wish my colleagues to have the benefits of his thoughts. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent that the speech be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the remarks were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REMARKS OF FORMER SENATOR PAUL J. FANNIN TO THE PHOENIX SOUTH MOUNTAIN ROTARY CLUB AT THE DORADO'S INN, DECEMBER 15, 1981

The Japanese are not superhumans, but the American taxpayer is making them look that way. I'm talking about $70 billion relief provided Japan by American taxpayers this year, and it will be more next year if we continue to ignore this threat to the survival of our manufacturing community now furnishing millions of jobs to our people.

Those Japanese automobiles which in 1980 claimed 23 percent of the new car sales in the U.S. would be priced a great deal higher were it not for this $70 billion indirect subsidy the American taxpayers provided. This would be true of the other Japanese products that are flooded our markets and competing with us on the world markets.

(We didn't actually send $70 billion in subsidy to Japan last year)—$70 billion is the difference between what Japan actually spent on their national defense and what they would have spent if they had paid their fair share of the free world's defense including their own country's, instead of free loading on the United States. their total national budget was reduced by that amount. In business terms their overhead was lowered to that extent.

While Japan was becoming a world leader in the electronic industry, the steel industry and becoming the world's largest shipbuilders as well as builders of more cars than any other nation, the United States taxpayers indirectly subsidized their country by several hundred billion dollars.

Japan's imports into the United States are more devastating to our economy and jobs this year than ever before and from all indications will be worse next year. This year our trade deficit with Japan is $15 billion which is the largest trade deficit ever, exceeding last year's $9 billion deficit by over 50 percent. This will continue and become more devastating to our economy if we don't rebel.

American manufacturers are taxed heavily to meet our defense expenditures; whereas, the Japanese, relieved by the United States of the principal part of their fair share of the free world's defense, give special tax relief, including the elimination of their commodity tax on exports, have no capital gains tax and lower taxes for business investments. For example, business loans today in Japan are at rates below 7%. Some businesses, Japan desires to promote, are furnished development bank loans covering up to 80% and more of their operating capital. Their goal is to assist their companies to dominate world markets.

The Japanese government gives other special assistance through their Ministry of International Trade and Industry such as import protection, direct subsidies for marketing, especially for exports but also for research and development of high technology. In many of their industries, the Japanese Government gives subsidies for scrapping manufacturing equipment if more efficient equipment becomes available, plus giving special accelerated depreciation for the introduction of the superior new equipment.

The Japanese government would not have the generous funds for these promotions if they were expending over 25% of their budget on defense as we are doing. Last year they spent 5.2% of their budget on defense, and next year will probably spend about the same; whereas, our expenditures will increase, with a projected 32% of our budget allocated to defense by 1985. In dollar figures, last year, Japan allocated less than $11 billion for defense, while we were allocating over $180 billion.

Based on Japan's now one-half of the United States GNP and even a greater percentage of industrial production and with one-half our population, their fair share of defense expenditures should be at least one-half that of the United States.

Recently the Japanese Ministry of Finance, the Ministry of International Trade and Industry and the Economic Planning Agency successfully opposed the Japanese Defense Agencies' request for additional funds on the grounds that even the present rate of defense spending was not necessary and might interfere with their economic growth.

Yes, Japan is free loading on the United States. This must stop, or we will have millions more workers out of jobs and more industries going bankrupt. We have run a trading deficit with Japan since 1965; and, as I have stated, its growth is rapidly escalating.

You may wonder—why is the United States subsidizing a prosperous industrial competitor that is flooding our markets with manufactured products and also taking business away from us throughout the world markets?

In 1960 when Japan's GNP was $43 billion, 1/12 or less than ours, and they were still recovering from World War II, and the United States was still the most powerful nation in the world economically and militarily, we agreed under the U.S.-Japan Security Treaty to give full defense protection to Japan without any quid pro quo. The agreement was for ten years but to continue unless abrogated by either party giving the other a one-year notice. By the middle of the sixties, Japan was becoming a prosperous nation; but this treaty continued with all its one-sided stipulations. Today, Japan leads the industrial nations of the world in GNP growth reaching $1.23 trillion last year, about one-half the U.S.; their population is about one-half of ours with their industrial production about 75 percent of the U.S. Their fair share of the free world's defense should be at least 50 percent that of the United States. If last year Japan had contributed their fair share of the free world's defense, their defense outlay should have been more than $70 billion dollars and that is where the subsidy comes in. In business terminology, their overhead is reduced to the extent they do not meet their fair share of the free world's defense.

Many Japanese leaders have for years acknowledged their rapid growth and prosperity have been made possible by the United States-Japan Security Treaty of 1960.

Heigo Fujii, a vice-president of Nippon Steel Corporation, wrote an article published in a book titled "Japan and Current World Affairs." This is what Mr. Fujii said in the early 1970's:

"Defense spending now requires only 8 to 9 percent of Japan's national budget, and until some years ago there was almost no defense spending by Japan at all."

"To the best of our knowledge it was, unfortunately, Japan that started the Pacific war and, as a result, paid a great price and lost."

"If the United States—had demanded half of Japan's territory or even the island of Kyushu—Japan under the conditions existing at the time the war ended was in no position to say no."

"However, the United States did not seek any territory whatever. Instead, America provided $3½ billion worth of almost immediate economic aid to Japan and earnestly cooperated in Japan's economic reconstruction."

"At the same time the United States abetted Japan in setting up the new system called Democracy. All this made possible the economic growth Japan has achieved today."

That was written in 1971 when, as Mr. Fujii stated, their defense spending was 8 to 9 pecent of their total budget. This year that figure is down to 5.2 percent.

At the September, 1980 Tokyo conference to commemorate the 20th anniversary of the United States-Japan Mutual Security Treaty, former Defense Agency Chief Asao Mihara said, "The Japan-United States security system actually has played a decisively important role as a pillar of freedom, peace, security and the prosperity for Japan for nearly thirty years."

"Under the security treaty system, the Japanese people were able to concentrate their efforts first on recovery from World War II and then on the development of our economic strength and attaining the status of a great economic power, becoming the country with the second highest industrial production in the free world."

Speaking specifically of the U.S.-Japan Mutual Security Treaty, Mihara pointed out, "That although the United States was obligated to defend Japan, Japan was not required to do the same."

Mihara said, "This may have been permissible when Japan's economy was only one-tenth that of the United States; but today when the ratio is 1-to-2, the treaty needs to be revised."

When the Japanese surrendered in 1945, we were in a mood to impose conditions designed to prevent the Japanese from rearming—from ever again becoming a military threat in the Pacific. No consideration was given that Russia would soon become a threat to Japan and the U.S.

Now we live in a world quite different from the world of 1945. Although we were not obligated to do so thanks to the generosity of the American people and the money provided by the American taxpayers, we rebuilt the economy of Western Europe, and we rebuilt the economy of Japan. We fought the bloody Korean War to a stalemate in an effort to maintain freedom in the Western Pacific. We became embroiled in Vietnam for precisely the same reason.

For the past 36 years, the United States of America has contributed the lion's share of the cost for the military forces the West must maintain if peace is to be preserved.

During this period, Communist Russia has relentlessly expanded its military force. Until today, their navy is larger and more modern than ours, their ICBM's are more numerous and have greater throw weight than ours, and their tactical weapons deployed on the continent of Europe vastly outnumbered the defensive weapons of NATO.

We support a very costly effort to maintain peace in the Middle East and to protect the world's trade routes, which are more important to Japan than most any other nation.

Although the NATO countries outspent Japan during the seventies by as much as 5 or 6-to-1 of GNP, the United States still carried the principal share of the free world's defense. Japan's share has been slightly increased, but they are still the free rider spending last year only about ¼ the percentage of GNP as the average of the NATO nations.

The leaders of Japan know this. Former Defense Agency Chief Shin Kanemaru in September, 1980 said, "The Japanese defense posture is so weak, it cannot be considered a fighting force."

Japan with a contemplated budget for their Fiscal Year ending April 1, 1982 is spending less than 1 percent of their GNP on defense—less than $12 billion compared with our projected expenditure of around $200 billion.

For many years, the American taxpayers have with very little complaint contributed from 5 to 10 percent of our gross national product to the cause of defense. Presently, we are paying over 5 percent of our GNP for defense, and the Reagan administration proposes to increase this to about 7 percent of our GNP which will carry us to about $250 billion in 1985.

On a per capita basis in 1979, Japan spent about $74 per person on defense.

The West Germans and the French spent approximately $274 per person.

In 1981 on a per capita basis, Japan will spend about $82; the U.S. will spend about $600 per person.

We all recognize that Great Britain is in dire economic straights; but, even so, Great Britain last year spent about 5 percent of their gross national product on defense. If Japan had spent as much percentage wise of GNP as Great Britain, the free world defense budget would have increased by 20 percent. In 1971 I joined my colleagues on the Subcommittee on International Trade complaining to the Senate members. We stated, "Japan has been able to concentrate its efforts in the expansion of commercial markets because only 7.2 percent of its budget is spent on defense (compared to 37 percent in the U.S.), and only 0.8 percent of its GNP is defense as compared to 8.9 percent in the U.S."

Since that time instead of assuming their fair share of the free world's defense, they have continued to hide behind obsolete provisions in their constitution and the outmoded United States-Japan Mutual Security Agreement which, as I have stated, many Japanese leaders acknowledge should have been updated years ago.

I repeat—as long as our leaders permit Japan to have their cost of government reduced by 20 to 25 percent of their national budget by our maintaining a defense umbrella for them, we will have more and more of our people dropped from manufacturing plants throughout our nation because of our inability to compete.

Japan has the ability to compete on the world market and still carry their fair share of the free world's defense. I have admiration for their productive efficiency and their inventive technology; I admire their labor system which has given them the highest productivity of any major nation, but they could not have built and maintained their manufacturing complex that is flooding the world markets without the free ride the U.S. is giving them.

When I was a member of the Senate, I observed the hopelessness of getting American products into Japan, if the Japanese government did not want them. At that time the shoe was on the other foot. On car exports to Japan, we were paying tariff and nontariff barriers of over 100 percent; whereas, we were open to imports at a tariff of 4½ percent which is now down to 3 percent. Today, they say their tariff is completely removed, but they fail to tell that their nontariff barriers double the price of an American car sold in Japan.

Although the Japanese leaders have publicly confessed the existing inequity, they are going to cling to the present privileged position as long as they can. They will be able to do this until the people of this nation insist upon a change. What should we do?

Step 1. Immediately negotiable on orderly marketing agreement to end the trade preferences enjoyed by Japan under the GATT agreement and nontariff barriers they maintain to protect their markets.

Step 2. We should insist that within three years the defense expenditures of the Japanese equal the average of the NATO countries on a GNP basis and that the NATO countries and Japan, each should equal the U.S. in defense spending on an equitable formula within five years.

If the Japanese do not desire to build a military complex for themselves, then they should build, in dollar amounts to meet Step 2., naval vessels, aircraft and mobile equipment, all badly needed by the free world countries to be furnished to NATO to help meet the challenge of Russia; or pay to the United States on a percentage of their GNP an amount to meet Step 2. as outlined.

If the Japanese fail to respond, if they refuse to increase their defense expenditures, we must follow the lead of other nations and drastically reduce the amount of Japanese imports permitted into the United States; and rewrite the U.S.-Japanese Security Treaty on a quid pro quo basis, which should be done in any event.

As recently as March, 1981, I testified on this problem before the members of the Senate Finance Committee. A number of Senators, including Senator John Tower, Chairman of the Armed Services Committee, are working on this problem.

I am convinced that once the American people become fully acquainted with the current inequities, they will demand the Federal Government take action or will act themselves. The most powerful weapon we have is for the American taxpayer to boycott Japanese products until they agree to accept their responsibility to share fairly the free world's defense.

Please remember these figures—prosperous Japan has reported they will spend less than $12 billion on defense next year. The United States, almost one trillion dollars in debt, will spend about $200 billion of your money for defense.

Again I reiterate, on any equitable formula, Japan should contribute to the free world defense one-half as much as our nation.

Our military budget will be up $80 billion dollars in the years 1979-1982. Japan's as they now report will be up less than $3 billion.

No longer can we accept excuses of the Japanese Constitution or obsolete treaties prohibiting a defense buildup. The freedom of all Western countries is at stake with Japan one of the most vulnerable to Russia's powerful navy and air forces.

Whatever needs to be done to enable Japan to meet their fair share of the free world's defense must be rapidly accomplished.

Every American should be shocked to learn that Japan refuses to assist the other free countries of the world by having even a semblance of a military force to protect their own country, and that they are free loading on the United States at a savings to them of over $70 billion this year.

If we had subsidized Chrysler to the extent of 20 percent of their budget, as we have subsidized Japan and its industries, Chrysler would be prosperous today.

If Japan does not cooperate, the administration and every member of Congress should in mass disclose to the American people and the free world the true story of the Japanese free loaders.

Inaction will be disastrous to the future of our country.

REMARKS OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES BEFORE THE CONFERENCE OF THE CHIEF JUSTICES OF THE STATE COURTS

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, last Saturday evening those of us on the Committee on the Judiciary who attended the fifth annual Brookings Institute on the Administration of Justice had the distinct honor of joining with the chief justices of the State supreme courts for dinner. On that occasion, the Attorney General of the United States, William French Smith, delivered a speech I know was well received by the State court justices and also those of us who have watched the court system of this Nation become flooded with criminal appellate cases.

The Attorney General addressed an issue that is both a recommendation of his task force on violent crime and the subject of proposals before Congress—limitations on habeas corpus appeals.

These actions—which accounted for nearly 8,000 cases in the Federal courts last year—are basically attacks on the finality of State court convictions in criminal cases. What defendants allege in these appeals is essentially that they did not get a fair trial in the State courts and now seek a review of those State court proceedings by the Federal courts.

Habeas corpus means literally "you have the body" which results in a writ from a court demanding that the prisoner be brought before it. Historically, this has been one of the original guarantees of personal liberty, and it should continue to be.

In the judgment of many, however, this use of the habeas corpus writ has been abused by prisoners and lawyers who simply file such petitions regardless of the true merits of the case. The result is that the courts are so overwhelmed with these requests for review that the truly deserving ones get lost in the process.

In his speech, the Attorney General sets forth eloquently these and other arguments for placing limitations on the ability of State prisoners to file habeas corpus actions. He also indicated that he will submit legislation to Congress this week to accomplish these objectives. I look forward to his submission of this important subject.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the remarks of Attorney General Smith delivered in Williamsburg this past weekend be printed at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the remarks were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REMARKS OF HON. WILLIAM FRENCH SMITH, ATTORNEY GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES

There is something in the air of Williamsburg—a scent of American history—that breathed deeply draws the mind back to the origins of this unique republic. America has not always been the great economic and military power to which we and the world have grown so accustomed. Since its beginnings, however, this Nation has always been something grander. Our country was founded upon a novel idea—the idea of liberty. Its federalist system of government was designed to perpetuate and preserve free institutions and a free people.

Just last Tuesday night, in his State of the Union Address, the President placed renewed emphasis upon the role of federalism in our system of government. He noted: "This Administration has faith in State and local governments and the constitutional balance envisioned by the founding fathers." In recent years, however, too few federal officials have shown full faith in the other levels of government in this country—and a recognition of the faithful governing that they do every day.

In No. 45 of The Federalist Papers, James Madison admonished: "The powers delegated by the proposed Constitution to the federal government are few and defined. Those which are to remain in the State governments are numerous and indefinite. . . . The powers reserved to the several States will extend to all the objects which, in the ordinary course of affairs, concern the lives, liberties, and properties of the people; and the internal order, improvement, and prosperity of the State."

In Federalist No. 46 Madison reemphasized the same point even "[i]f . . . the people should . . . become more partial to the federal than to the State governments. . . ." As Madison warned, "it is only within a certain sphere that the federal power can, in the nature of things, be advantageously administered."

In the nearly two centuries since the publication of the Federalist Papers—and the adoption of our Constitution—federal officials have too frequently thwarted valuable state and local government efforts. In its contemplation of the Supremacy Clause, the federal government has sometines forgotten that state and local officials also swear adherence to the U.S. Constitution and often know how best to govern the affairs of their own states.

Nearly fifty years ago, Justice Brandeis wrote the following: "To stay experimentation in things social and economic is a grave reponsibility. Denial of the right to experiment may be fraught with serious consequences to the Nation. It is one of the happy incidents of the federal system that a single courageous State may, if its citizens choose, serve as a laboratory; and try novel social and economic experiments without risk to the country."

Experiments attempted by the federal government inevitably affect the entire country. Those attempted at the state level, however, present less of a risk—what doesn't work can be more easily changed, and what does work can be taken up by other states on a broader and firmer basis.

The Reagan Administration is acting on those principles of federalism. Today, I want to outline some of the steps the Justice Department is taking to make federalism more of a reality.

Symbolic of our concern for state and local government is, for example, our new litigation notice policy. Under this Administration, the Justice Department will give prior notice to state governors and attorneys general before commencing any litigation against entities of state government. We will consult with the appropriate state officials, and we will defer to the state policy decisions whenever that is legally permissible. As a result, more potential controversies can be resolved without confrontation.

In many other ways, moreover, the Department will show greater concern and appreciation for the role of state and local government in our system. For example, our crime program has been constructed to reflect that concern.

As I mentioned in my remarks last evening, the Administration has proposed a comprehensive program to improve the federal effort in our Nation's fight against crime. The proposed Federal Criminal Code that forms part of that program contains over 100 significant improvements in federal criminal law. In addition, the package addresses some twenty other areas of criminal justice—and contains another forty legislative proposals and fifteen administrative initiatives.

The first goal of our crime package is to ensure full federal cooperation with state and local law enforcement—and to direct federal resources more effectively against the different crime problems experienced in different localities. To achieve that end, I have directed each U.S. Attorney to create a Law Enforcement Coordinating Committee and to develop—in conjunction with state and local law enforcement—a plan that recognizes local and state criminal justice priorities. The proposed Federal Criminal Code would reenforce that commitment to state and local law enforcement—a plan that recognizes local and state criminal justice priorities. The proposed Federal Criminal Code would reenforce that commitment to state and local priorities by explicitly authorizing federal law enforcement to decline or discontinue use of federal concurrent jurisdiction whenever an offense can be effectively prosecuted by the states and there is not a substantial federal interest in the prosecution.

By employing federal resources—including concurrent jurisdiction—in response to the specific crime problems that are perceived to be most serious in particular localities, federal law enforcement can and will make a bigger difference in the fight against crime. Through enhanced cooperation—for example, the Law Enforcement Coordinating Committees and the cross-designation of prosecutors in both state and federal systems—all levels of law enforcement can begin to employ their resouces in unison and in accordance with the strengths each can contribute to the fight against crime. When there is concurrent jurisdiction, cases developed by federal, state, and local investigators could then be presented in the judicial system best suited to the facts, statutes, sanctions, and space on the dockets.

Tonight, I also want to announce another federalist initiative that will affect state judicial systems. We recognize the need for some change in the relationship between federal and state courts.

Some tend to forget that most of the judging done in this Nation is done by state—not federal—courts. By 1980 at least five million cases were being filed annually in the state court systems and the local courts of the District of Columbia and Puerto Rico. In fact, depending upon definition and estimation, the actual number could be more than twice that large. On the other hand, less than 170,000 lawsuits were filed in federal courts. Although there are some 17,000 courthouses in the country, less than two percent are federal courthouses.

This does not mean, however, that the federal courts are unimportant—only that, by an overwhelming proportion, most of the legal rights vindicated in this country are vindicated in the state courts. Unfortunately, it also means that the federal courts sometimes interfere too extensively in the operation of the state court system.

One type of interference is quite familiar to all of the state chief justices in the audience—the current availability of federal habeas corpus for those convicted in state courts. Next week the Department of Justice will transmit to the Congress proposals to amend the habeas corpus statutes to correct abuses which have developed and restore finality to criminal convictions without undermining the protection of federal constitutional rights. Our proposals will recognize and foster the independent stature and dignity of the state courts.

The problem in this area has long been clear. Considering the availability of habeas corpus in 1970, Judge Henry Friendly was moved to paraphrase Winston Churchill. He noted that after state trial, conviction, sentence, appeal, affirmance and denial or certiorari by the United States Supreme Court, the criminal process was not at an end, or even the beginning of the end, but only the end of the beginning. There were nearly 7,800 habeas filings by state prisoners in federal courts in the year ending in June of 1981. And that number fails to take account of the number of appeals filed in the federal appellate courts from denials by the federal district courts. Thirty years ago your Conference of Chief Justices complained that federal habeas filings by state prisoners caused "inordinate delays," "grave and undesirable" federal-state conflicts and "the impairment of the public confidence in our judicial institutions." In 1953, Justice Robert Jackson expressed his concern over the "floods of stale, frivolous and repetitious petitions (for federal habeas corpus by state prisoners which) inundate the docket of the lower courts and swell our own." Although that flood reached a peak in 1970, the number of petitions filed last year was over fourteen times as great as when Justice Jackson complained of the inundation. Of further concern, last year saw a disturbing eleven percent increase over the preceding year.

Not only is the number of filings large in itself, but it must be remembered that these are not new cases. They are cases which have already been through the state court system—and usually through state collateral proceedings as well. The question perhaps should not be how many such filings there are but why there should be any at all. This Conference of Chief Justices itself, in a resolution adopted last August, noted that "a sustantial number of duplicative, overlapping, and repetitive reviews of state criminal convictions in the federal courts unduly prolong and call into question state criminal proceedings without furthering the historic purposes of the writ of habeas corpus."

The costs of the current broad availability of habeas corpus have become clear. The continual availability of the possibility of relief has turned many prisoners into writ-writers who never confront the fact of their guilt and get on with the process or rehabilitation, but view the criminal process as an ongoing game in which they are still active contestants. The same appearance is conveyed to the public, with a consequent and deserved loss of respect for the criminal process. Questions may be raised on federal habeas corpus long after witnesses and participants have vanished from the scene, making not only response to the petition but retrial difficult. Gathering witnesses and relevant material is often expensive and time-consuming if required long after the event in question. And, as Justice Jackson has put it, "it must prejudice the occasional meritorious application to be buried in a flood of worthless ones. He who must search a haystack for a needle is likely to end up with the attitude that the needle is not worth the search."

I do not have to tell this audience that the broad availability of federal habeas corpus for those who have been convicted after a full and fair trial in state court, with appellate review, represents a serious strain on federalism. In our view, it is an excessive strain.

Our first proposal involves redetermination of matters previously adjudicated in state proceedings. Under current law there is a somewhat odd contrast between redetermination of factual issues and redetermination of legal issues. No federal evidentiary hearing is required on a factual matter determined after a full and fair hearing in state court, and state court findings are treated as presumptively correct. No similar deference exists concerning legal issues. It is as if state judges were considered adequate fact-finders but incapable interpreters of law.

In historical terms, the disparate treatment of the re-examination of factual and legal issues is a relatively recent innovation. It does not appear that a distinction of this sort was recognized prior to 1953 and the decision of Brown v. Allen. In the 1944 decision of Ex Parte Hawk, for example, the Supreme Court stated that "[w]here the state courts have considered and adjudicated the merits of . . . [a petitioner's] . . . contentions . . . a federal court will not ordinarily re-examine upon writ of habeas corpus the questions thus adjudicated." No distinction was drawn in the statement of the rule between factual and non-actual questions.

We will propose legislative repeal of the rule requiring routine re-determination by federal courts of legal and mixed legal-factual determinations of the state courts. Where an issue—whether factual or non-factual—has been fully and fairly adjudicated in state proceedings, a federal court need not and ordinarily should not undertake an independent examination of the issues.

As one state appellate judge wrote in an article published last year: "If our nation's bifurcated judicial system is to be retained, as I am sure it will be, it is clear that we should strive to make both the federal and the state systems strong, independent, and viable. . . . State judges in assuming office take an oath to support the federal as well as the state constitution. State judges do in fact rise to the occasion when given the responsibility and opportunity to do so. It is a step in the right direction to defer to the state courts and give finality to their judgments on federal constitutional questions where a full and fair adjudication has been given in the state court."

That is the step we will urge Congress to take. By the way, the author of the passage just quoted is no longer a state court judge. She now sits on the U.S. Supreme Court.

Our second proposal relates to claims that could have been raised in state proceedings, but were not raised at the time or in the manner required by state procedural rules. With the decision of Wainwright v. Sykes in 1977, the Supreme Court instituted a salutary reform in the standard governing the effect of such "procedural defaults," requiring proof of actual "prejudice" and "cause" justifying the default. The question of what constitutes "cause" under this standard has been the subject of considerable litigation. The question has been presented most frequently when an attorney's failure to raise a federal claim may reflect questionable judgment, but does not rise to the level of constitutional ineffectiveness. Under our proposals, lesser degrees of attorney error or misjudgment would not be recognized as adequate cause for failure to raise the federal claim in a state proceeding.

Our third proposal relates directly to the problem of finality. Under current law, habeas corpus petitions can be brought at any time, without limitation. The practical effect of this approach is that petitions are sometimes brought many years—or even decades—after the conclusion of state proceedings. The practical difficulties of reconstructing occurrences after so great a span of time has elapsed are apparent. Although the habeas rules do incorporate vague notions of laches, such an approach depends on a balancing of equities, over which reasonable differences of judgment will often be possible. Hence, they presently afford no definite end to litigation.

I believe that the present approach to delayed filings in habeas corpus petitions does not accord appropriate weight to the importance of finality in criminal adjudication. Accordingly, our legislative proposal will include a limitation period applicable to habeas corpus petitions by state prisoners.

All of the issues I have discussed this evening reflect one basic point. This Administration and Department of Justice believe wholeheartedly in our Constitution and the federalist system it created. In our dealings with the states, we will exhibit a renewed federal sensitivity to the legitimate exercise of their responsibilities under the Constitution.

The great British statesman Gladstone once observed that the United States Constitution is "[t]he most wonderful work ever struck off at a given time by the brain and purpose of man." It truly is a "wonderful work." It created a multi-faceted system that restrains government from abusing its power, but allows government to exercise its powers effectively. Implicit in that document is a remarkable realism—an understanding that no one institution, no one branch of government, no one level of government possesses all the wisdom needed to govern well.

In a speech to the Constitutional Convention, Benjamin Franklin summed up both the insight of the Founding Fathers and the nature of our constitutional system when he said: "I cannot help expressing a wish that every member . . . doubt a little of his own infallibility."

It is time the federal government recognized its own fallibility. It is time the federal government recognized the contributions to governing America of which the states are capable. This Administration will do exactly that.

DR. ARMAND HAMMER

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, one of my most remarkable constituents is an immensely successful California capitalist named Armand Hammer. Dr. Hammer, who was a self-made millionaire by the time he graduated from medical school, has found it possible as a businessman to thrive not only in America's free enterprise atmosphere but in dealings in the Soviet Union and in Libya.

In a recent letter to the New York Times, published December 21, 1981, Dr. Hammer described the origins of his activities in the latter two countries and the official origins—in requests from two Presidents, John F. Kennedy and Jimmy Carter—of two missions he undertook in the Soviet Union.

I ask unanimous consent that Dr. Hammer's letter be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A RESPONSE FROM ARMAND HAMMER

In my view, Edward Jay Epstein's article "The Riddle of Armand Hammer" (Nov. 29) unfairly represents several important aspects in the story of my life. There are some misrepresentations which go beyond the levels of tolerance. These are the ones that by a pen stroke attempt to denigrate or destroy the very meaning of one's life. This I cannot tolerate in silence.

My role as a capitalist, in contrast to my father's support of the Socialist and Communist Parties, is well known. My belief that communication between the two superpowers through trade and cultural exchanges—while maintaining a strong defense and striving for limitation of armaments—can avert the possibility of nuclear war is well documented.

The writer implies that I created my personal empire largely by dealing with nations hostile to the United States. He further states that I became a multimillionaire capitalist through my cordial relations for more than half a century with the leaders of the Soviet Union. When I went to the Soviet Union for the first time in 1921, I had already built a multimillion-dollar business.

As a young premedical student at Columbia, unfortunate financial events forced me to take over direction of my father's small pharmaceutical company. My father, a busy general practitioner in New York, had invested with a dishonest partner. I had no choice but to save the business by day, and study for my degree at night.

Fortunately, I was able to do this and on graduation found myself both a physician, intending to specialize in bacteriology, as well as a millionaire.

Since I had a six-month wait before starting my residency at Bellevue, I went to the Soviet Union to fight typhus in the Urals as well as to collect moneys due my company for pharmaceuticals shipped to the Soviet Union on credit.

Overtaken by events, I found the role of businessman thrust upon me. I saw the horror of famine in the Urals and realized people could be saved by importing American grain. I put at risk a million dollars, arranging a grain shipment, for which I was reimbursed with goods salable in the United States. This brought me to the attention of Lenin.

An article quoting me in The New York Times of June 14, 1922, when I first returned on a visit home, best describes my role: "When I conferred with officials of the Government, I told them I was a capitalist; that I was out to make money, but entertained no idea of grabbing their land or their empire. They said in effect: 'We understand you did not come for love. As long as you do not mix in our politics, we will give you our help.' "

There was nothing hidden about these arrangements, which I detailed in my 1933 book, "The Quest for the Romanoff Treasure." Further documentation, including the Lenin letters, appeared in Bob Considine's biography, "The Remarkable Life of Dr. Armand Hammer," published in 1975.

The article implies that my relations with Soviet leaders were continuous for over five decades. In 1930, I left Moscow, never having met Stalin, and did not return until 1961, when President John F. Kennedy asked me to serve as an emissary to Nikita S. Khrushchev.

During the height of Hitler's alliance with Stalin, I took a very strong pro-British position and worked with President Franklin D. Roosevelt to create the destroyer-for-bases exchange in 1940.

I will not quote from all the records available in the archives, except for a sworn statement by Eleanor Roosevelt: "Not only did I know Dr. Hammer very well in a business way, but I knew him much better socially. He was many times to the White House for dinner. . . . Not only do I admire him, but for his great service to our country in the late war, my husband, the President, esteemed him highly."

Several days after his inauguration, President Kennedy asked me to go to Moscow to open new lines of communication with Mr. Khrushchev following the summit breakdown after the U-2 incident. My mission was considered very successful by the President, when I reported to him in the White House family quarters in the presence of Representative James Roosevelt.

In August 1978, Marshall Shulman, special adviser on Soviet affairs, asked me on behalf of President Jimmy Carter to journey to Moscow and meet with Leonid I. Brezhnev in an attempt to free an American businessman. Francis Jay Crawford, a representative of International Harvester, was being held on charges of blackmarketing and faced the probability of imprisonment. I was able to confer with Mr. Brezhnev and a favorable solution was immediately reached.

Occidental's historic fertilizer barter agreement with the Soviet Union is misunderstood. Certainly it appeared controversial, but it was part of our national foreign policy, initiated immediately following President Nixon's 1972 Moscow summit conference. The transaction was studied by the Administration and the Congress. Over the course of a year, a task force of Cabinet departments, including the Secretaries of State, Commerce and Treasury, as well as Henry Kissinger, then national security adviser, reviewed and approved it. This culminated in the issuance of President Richard M. Nixon's "national interest letter" to William J. Casey, then president of the Export-Import Bank, now Director of Central Intelligence.

The fertilizer transaction with all its complexities was proceeding successfully when the Soviet Union invaded Afghanistan.

While President Carter was contemplating an embargo, I felt it important that our position be clearly stated, and I wrote him on Jan. 17, 1980: "I am very much in support of whatever decisions you make in relations with the Soviet Union. . . . Occidental is an American company and will support the decision you deem in the best interest of our country."

The President wrote back on Jan. 29: "Thank you for your continued support of our decisions. . . . I wish to express my appreciation for your understanding and support as we make those decisions that we believe are best for the country and the world."

The article also unfairly represents, I believe, my relations with President Reagan, citing national security adviser Richard V. Allen's efforts to limit my access, and describing President Reagan's responses to my letters as "cool."

The President recently honored me with a commission as chairman of the President's Cancer Panel, signed by him and Secretary of State Alexander M. Haig Jr. This speaks for itself.

Lack of space prevents me from listing all the disagreements I have with the author, but I must address one other: Occidental's remarkable growth has not hinged alone on deals with nations hostile to American interests and is not a result of my relations with Col. Mu'ammar el-Qadhafi, whom I have never met. The Libyan concession was granted to us by King Idris, an ally of the United States, five years before Colonel Qadhafi came to power. Occidental is only one of several American companies still producing oil in Libya.

The decision to accept a tax increase by Libya in 1970 was made by all Western companies and historians of OPEC recognize that its strength grew when the major oil companies capitulated to the nationalization of Aramco.

Our successful corporate efforts in Great Britain, Peru, Mexico, Canada, Italy and Australia and other nations friendly to the United States clearly indicate Occidental's support of American policies.

Throughout my life, I have been an American capitalist proud to carry its symbol around the world. As the record clearly demonstrates, Occidental and Armand Hammer are dedicated to this great country and its purposes. I hope that this letter helps solve "The Riddle of Armand Hammer."

PRESIDENT CHUN'S INITIATIVE

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, Republic of Korea President Chun Doo Hwan has made an important proposal for uniting North and South Korea. As the Republic of Korea's friend and ally, we should applaud President Chun's efforts to reduce tensions between the north and south and to take steps for normalization of the situation on the peninsula.

President Chun renewed his call for a summit meeting with North Korean President Kim Il-Sung. Although reaction from the north has so far been negative, we do hope that President Chun's overtures will be reciprocated. Normalization of the situation between the north and the south with a view toward unification in the future would contribute significantly to peace and stability in the Asian and Pacific region.

President Chun made his proposal in his New Year Policy Statement at the opening ceremonies of the Korean National Assembly on January 23. The speech was broadcast nationwide on television and radio.

President Chun's proposal includes the formation of a "Consultative Conference for National Reunification" with participants from the north and the south to draft a unified constitution. In the interim, President Chun called for a provisional agreement to normalize the situation. He proposed a preparatory conference to be attended by cabinet-rank chief delegates from both sides to work out the procedures for a summit meeting.

Without objection, I ask unanimous consent that a summary of President Chun's proposals be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE CONSULTATIVE CONFERENCE FOR NATIONAL REUNIFICATION

It is suggested that the South and the North organize a Consultative Conference for National Reunification (CCNR) composed of representatives from the South and the North representing the views of the residents in their respective areas;

This body would be authorized to draft a constitution designed to establish a unified, democratic republic on the Korean peninsula committed to the ideals of national integrity, democracy, liberty and individual well being;

When such a draft constitution is drawn up, it would be made into law by both sides through a free, democratic referendum held throughout the whole peninsula;

THE DRAFTNG OF THE CONSTITUTION

In the process of drafting a unified constitution, such issues as the political ideology, the name of the unified country, basic domestic and foreign policies, the form of the government, and the methods and dates of the general elections for a unified legislature will be discussed and agreed upon in the CCNR in the course of drafting the constitution.

INTERIM MEASURES

As an interim measure during the preparatory period pending the achievement of national unification, a Provisional Agreement on Basic Relations between South and North Korea would be concluded and would contain the following provisions:

First, relations between South and North Korea shall be based on the principle of equality and reciprocity pending unification;

Second, the South and the North shall abandon all forms of military force and violence, as well as the threat thereof, as a means of settling issues between them and seek peaceful solutions to all problems through dialogue and negotiation;

Third, South and North Korea shall recognize each other's existing political order and social institutions and shall not interfere in each other's internal affairs in any way;

Fourth, both sides shall maintain the regime of the armistice in force while working out measures to end the arms race and military confrontation;

Fifth, both sides shall open each society to the other, facilitating free travel, including the reunion of separated families, and promoting exchanges and cooperation in various fields;

Sixth, both parties shall respect each other's bilateral and multilateral treaties and agreements and consult with each other on issues affecting the interests of the Korean people as a whole;

Seventh, the South and the North shall each appoint a plenipotentiary envoy with the rank of cabinet minister to head a resident liaison mission to be established in Seoul and Pyongyang.

PREPARATORY CONFERENCE FOR A SOUTH-NORTH SUMMIT MEETING

High-level delegations from both sides, headed by cabinet-rank chief delegates, should hold a preparatory conference to work out the necessary procedures for a meeting between the highest authorities of South and North Korea.

PURSUIT OF EXCELLENCE FIRES THE NEW YEAR

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, beginning a new year is usually a time for reflection on the year past and for a projection of our hopes and goals for the future. We examine what was accomplished, what could have been done better, and what needs to be improved—both on a personal and on a national level.

Hopefully, this reflection leads to a desire to devise methods of improvement or modification of approach and procedure, and the establishment of new goals.

A unique human characteristic is the drive to work constantly at bettering ourselves and the world we live in, and to strive for the best. The person who can surpass his limitations and excel in his actions is the one we admire and seek to emulate.

In his commentary, "Pursuant of Excellence Fires the New Year," University of Illinois President Stanley O. Ikenberry discusses Robert Nozick's concept of excellence and the vital role it plays in shaping our lives.

We, as Members of Congress, can benefit from the thoughts expressed in this article. Ikenberry speaks of standards of excellence, and how the pursuit of excellence continually changes and in turn establishes new standards. As a standard is reached, it must be redefined.

Last year marked the beginning of a new administration. The President, members of the administration and the Congress, as well as the rest of the country, began the new year with definite ideas of what should be accomplished and what standards of excellence should be reached.

Last year was a landmark year for our Nation. We have a President in the White House who has demonstrated great sincerity, warmth, strength of character, and a dedication to the ideals and values of our Nation.

He has given the country a new sense of direction. Congress has taken innovative steps in improving the economy and our relations and standing with the rest of the world. Senator HOWARD BAKER has demonstrated his competence as a great majority leader of the U.S. Senate.

However, by no means should we stop here. Now is the time to redefine our standards and our goals, and to determinedly work toward them. This involves the untiring dedication and effort of each Member of Congress as well as of the country as a whole, coupled with continual self-evaluation and reappraisal of the needs of our Nation. We must continually strive toward excellence in all areas.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article by President Ikenberry, which appeared in the December 31 issue of the Champaign-Urbana News-Gazette, be printed in the RECORD. I feel that as we face the new year, each one of us can benefit from this insightful article, and perhaps find some words of inspiration for the year ahead.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PURSUIT OF EXCELLENCE FIRES THE NEW YEAR

(By Stanley O. Ikenberry)

Students are home for the holidays and the campus exudes a quiet elegance brought on by new fallen snow. For some reason as I look out across the campus and enjoy the relaxed ambience of the moment, I am reminded of a recent essay by Robert Nozick, the philosopher, in which he discusses the concept of excellence. Excellence and the idea of a university are inseparable. We pursue it, aspire to exemplify it, fight to defend it, and labor to enhance it. So common is the concept of excellence, and yet few would profess fully to comprehend it.

Nozick's thoughts on excellence could be read as a commentary on the soul of the university. "Why do people pursue excellence?" he asked at the conclusion of his essay (1) "The grandest view I can give is the following: I think that pursuing excellence is a way of transcending the limits of our individual lives in various kinds of ways. One of the ways people seek to find meaning in their lives is to go beyond the limits of their individual existence." For many, this is the irresistible attraction that caused us to follow academic careers and to enjoy living in a university community.

There are different dimensions to excellence. One must begin, in my view, by appreciating its many facets and reject the notion of excellence as unidimensional. John Gardner, in his classic essay, observed that "An excellent plumber is infinitely more admirable than an incompetent philosopher. The society which scorns excellence in plumbing because plumbing is a humble activity and tolerates shoddiness in philosophy because it is an exalted activity will have neither good plumbing nor good philosophy. Neither its pipes nor its theories will hold water" (2).

Can one imagine a broader array of categories of excellence than exemplified by the University of Illinois? One thinks, for example, of the excellence of a William Warfield in music, on the one hand, and the excellence of a Charles Slichter or David Pines in physics on the other. There is the excellence of a Charles Osgood in communication as contrasted with the excellence of an Alexander Turyn in classics. It is a delight to recall the names, old and new.

Excellence, however, is normative as well as categorical. It is established by comparison and through competition. Whether we regard something as excellent depends on how it compares with other work of its type. Much of the rigor as well as the joy and much of the frustration as well as the exuberance of academic life are drawn from the struggle of striving—for excellence—being judged not only by comparison with the work of our peers, but subjecting ourselves to unrelenting self criticism and the harsh comparison of self expectations.

We speak of standards of excellence. One intriguing aspect of standards is that the pursuit of excellence ultimately alters the standard itself. Students stand on the shoulders of their professors and in turn set new standards for their students.

One thinks of the truly remarkable work of John Bardeen who set new standards of excellence in the field of physics. His work is being refined by a Nick Holonyak, who will set new standards of his own, as will his student Gregg Stillman. One thinks of the massive impact of a Nathan Newmark on standards in the field of civil engineering, standards now being pushed further by his students and their students.

Excellence is meaningless in the absence of standards. Standards in themselves, however, hold little meaning without some understanding of the evolutionary process through which they were derived. The dream of the pianist, the poet, the engineer, the philosopher, the surgeon and the scientist is not merely to reach a standard of excellence, but to redefine it.

The grant of an academic prize can suggest that a new standard of excellence may have been set. This year, for example, Glenn Salisbury received the 1981 Wolf Prize in Agriculture; Tom Cureton the Silver Anniversary Award of the President's Council on Physical Fitness; Ian Hobson won the Leeds International Pianoforte Competition; Al Roth of Commerce received the 1980 Founders' Prize from the Texas Instruments Foundation; Ralph Wolfe, microbiologist, was elected to the National Academy of Sciences; and the list reads on.

Excellence entails apparently contradictory qualities. It invariably calls for a kind of singleminded focus of energies in a way not unlike the manner in which an athlete trains for competition, a scholar lives in the library, or a scientist is married to his laboratory. There is also frequently an uncommon sense of balance and breadth. Joe Doob, mathematician and recent National Medal of Science winner, is also a person with a keen interest in hiking and knowledge of the out-of-doors. Recall Howard Osborn accomplished mathematician and accomplished musician.

Those recognized as having achieved excellence have nearly always mastered the technique of their field, but having mastered it avoid being captured by mere technical elaboration. Given technical mastery, they return to focus on more fundamental issues.

And, in the case of excellence, perhaps the fundamental question is why people pursue excellence. Amid all the frustration, the rejection notices, and the lack of responsiveness of a large and complex bureaucracy, there remains the indescribable pleasure derived from a life spent in pursuit of excellence. The challenge, in the beginning, is to reach standards, and as time moves on, to create new ones. It is, as Nozick suggests, an opportunity "to transcend the limits of our individual lives" and to "go beyond the limits of individual existence." By transcending limits, one is engaged not merely in a personal act. As Nozick suggests, we all share in it. "It's humanity itself in a way that transcends those limits. By seeing somebody do something wonderful . . . something we cannot do ourselves . . . we are ennobled. There is something uplifting about belonging to the same species of people who do that."

The pursuit of excellence goes on in all sectors of human activity. It is not limited to the life of a university nor to the broader community in which we reside. As we turn the calendar and commence anew in 1982, we may do ourselves a service to recall our good fortune to be a part of a remarkable University and the communities in which it resides. We benefit from a heritage that comes to us from those who have gone before, not only at Illinois, but in a broader and more accurate sense, a heritage that comes from centuries of human striving. That spark will continue to fire the new year.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is closed.

TELEVISION AND RADIO COVERAGE OF SENATE PROCEEDINGS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, as I indicated earlier, it is my intention now to ask the Senate to proceed to consideration of Senate Resolution 20, a resolution providing for television and radio coverage of the proceedings of the Senate. I believe all Senators are on notice to that effect. I point out once again that there is an order, entered this morning, for the Chair to automatically recess the Senate at 12 o'clock noon. Therefore, it is clear that there will be no time for substantial debate on this motion prior to that recess period. I reiterate the reason for the recess from 12 o'clock to 2 o'clock is that there will be official caucuses of both the Republicans and Democratic Members of the Senate during that time period. I have found from experience that these caucuses tend to expedite rather than defer or slow down the progress of the Senate.

Mr. President, in keeping with the notice I have given previously, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar Order No. 251, Senate Resolution 20.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECESS UNTIL 2 P.M.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senate will stand in recess until 2 p.m. today.

The Senate, at 12:04 p.m., recessed until 2 p.m.; whereupon, the Senate reassembled when called to order by the Presiding Officer (Mr. KASTEN).

QUORUM CALL

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll, and the following Senators entered the Chamber and answered to their names:

[Quorum No. 2 Leg.]

Baker	Huddleston	Pell
Baucus	Inouye	Pryor
Byrd, Robert C.	Kasten	Randolph

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum is not present.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move that the Sergeant at Arms be instructed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Tennessee to instruct the Sergeant at Arms to request the attendance of absent Senators. On this question, the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Maine (Mr. COHEN), the Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER), the Senator from Florida (Mrs. HAWKINS), the Senator from California (Mr. HAYAKAWA), the Senator from Idaho (Mr. SYMMS), and the Senator from Connecticut (Mr. WEICKER), are necessarily absent.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Montana (Mr. BAUCUS), the Senator from New Jersey (Mr. BRADLEY), the Senator from Nevada (Mr. CANNON), and the Senator from Ohio (Mr. GLENN) are necessarily absent.

I also announce that the Senator from New Jersey (Mr. WILLIAMS) and the Senator from Delaware (Mr. BIDEN) are absent because of illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there other Senators in the Chamber who desire to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 86, nays 2, as follows:

TELEVISION AND RADIO COVERAGE OF SENATE PROCEEDINGS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, if I may have recognition for a moment and if we could have order in the Senate, the matter immediately pending before the Senate is the motion to proceed to consideration of Senate Resolution 20. It is my hope that we could dispose of this issue today on the matter to proceed. I must confess, however, that I observed surreptitiously the deposit of three rolls of cough drops in the desk drawer of the distinguished Senator from Louisiana, which may be a bad sign, at least for me.

I hope, nonetheless, Mr. President, that it might be possible to get on the resolution itself before this day is out. There will be opportunity—I trust not endless opportunity but, certainly, adequate opportunity—for debate on this resolution when we reach the resolution.

I point out that, for the least several years, almost without exception, it has been the policy to get on the measure—the bill or the resolution—in the event there is an extended debate or filibustering prospect and almost never on the motion to proceed.

It certainly is fully within the right of any Senator to speak at length on the motion to proceed which is now pending. I reiterate my hope that we can reach this matter, the resolution itself, before the day is out.

Mr. LONG. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BAKER. Yes.

Mr. LONG. Would the Senator not think it somewhat unfair to suggest that a Senator not speak before a Senator gets a chance to say anything? I would be willing to agree that even if one does not agree with me, to some extent, at least I should be able to speak before the Senator makes his speech.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I would not ever criticize the Senator from Louisiana, as I hope I have not done so so far. If I were a young and callow man in terms of politics, I might be reticent and assume in advance that the Senator from Louisiana might speak at some length on this subject. But I am not. I was once a young man, but I have now fully recovered from that condition.

Mr. President, I know from previous experience that the Senator from Louisiana is not only capable of speaking at great length and eloquently, but also with great effect. I am sure he understands, then, why I take every effort at the earliest opportunity to display to him by speaking at this point on this motion, that I have no desire to try to shorten the presentation anticipated by the Senator from Louisiana. My only hope was that we might have one filibuster instead of two.

Mr. LONG. May I plead with the Senator not to shut us up before we start talking; at least, give us a chance to make our point.

Mr. BAKER. I certainly cannot, as the Senator puts it, shut up the Senator from Louisiana even if I wanted to, which I do not. In deference to the point he just made, I shall sit down now and listen in rapt attention, but I hope not all day.

Mr. DANFORTH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, it is not my intention to speak at great length at this time, but I would, at an early point in the debate on Senate Resolution 20, like to share with the Senate some of my concerns about not just this resolution, but this course of deliberations and the style of the Senate in the hopes that, perhaps, something can be worked out to mitigate somewhat the concerns I shall express.

Mr. President, it is clear to me that the U.S. Senate is overloaded. That is to say, there is very little slack, there is very little empty space left in the time and in the activities of Senators. Each year, we begin a session in January and we are told, well, we shall be able to finish up in October. Then October gives way to November, then November gives way to December, and the Senate is now in session 12 months of the year.

I have been told by those who have been around longer than I that that was not always the case, that the Senate would begin business in January and go out, maybe, in the early part of the summer, and that was it. But that has now expanded from a 6-month year to a 12-month year.

I also have been told that Senators would have maybe 50 or 60 rollcall votes in the course of 1 year. Now we have, sometimes, 50 or 60 rollcall votes in the course of 1 week and 500 or 600 votes in 1 year. Why, Mr. President, has this occurred? Has the quality of debate in the Senate improved or deteriorated with the lengthening of the schedule and with the increase in the quantity of what we do?

At the beginning of this century, the business of the Senators was conducted on the floor. Their offices were their desks. Now we have two Senate office buildings and we are constructing a third Senate office building to accommodate the staffs that we have developed for ourselves. It is as though the daily routine of a Senator, instead of deliberating and considering the course of events for the country, is, instead, one of hurrying from one meeting to another, arriving at a committee meeting to ask questions and then rushing on to the next committee meeting to ask more questions.

In my experience, it is difficult to have a prolonged discussion on a one-on-one basis with another Member of the Senate. Instead, it seems so often that we are late in arriving at meetings, we are early in departing from meetings, and while we are there, we are interrupted by phone calls. Many of us think that all you have to do is look around at our fellow Senators. They are carrying large stacks, folders of materials, things to read and things to sign while we are in meetings and while we are engaging in conversations with one another.

This is supposed to be a deliberative body, Mr. President. It is supposed to be a body where great issues are contemplated and the course of a Nation is decided. But how much time is spent contemplating the great issues? Several years ago, there was an article written in the New York Times Magazine by a law school classmate of mine named Alan Novak. The title of the article was "The Bloated Branch." His idea was that more and more Members of Congress are not engaged in the discussion of large issues but engaged in trying to get some place in the sun, some unique spot that will capture the public's attention, some point that will differentiate them in the minds of the press and in the minds of the public so that they can emerge and become newsworthy characters.

He drew an analogy to vaudevillian "boffos," where characters on vaudeville had to have some special characteristic, some unique act or trick which would capture the attention and the imagination of the audience, something out of the ordinary.

My concern is that we ask for the rollcall votes over and over again, we make our points, and we offer amendments because, if we were to address the large issues, we would be lost among the editorial writers and everybody else who is addressing the large issues. If our public cannot comprehend or cannot encompass the big questions—war and peace and the state of the economy—at least we can put out a press release dealing with some little thing which is colorful. Already, I think, Mr. President, we are heading in that direction: A lot of little things, a lot of "boffos" that make the press and capture the public attention. But in the process, we are not very attentive to the larger issues. So we are overloaded.

Now, Mr. President, the nature of television, I argue, is different from the nature of any other medium because, unlike any other medium, television does not simply report the news. In a unique way, television creates the news. Television draws events to it, rather than simply going to where the events are. Television, in fact, changes the way of public discourse.

I know that some time ago, one of our colleagues put on a seminar. I was not present, but I am told that the subject was how a Senator should get himself on the evening news.

The way it turned out that a Senator should get on the evening news would be to state something in 60 seconds, to be able to say something in a 60-second period of time which could make the evening news and which could gain enough attention so that the news editor would want to put it on.

Well, Mr. President, that is not the nature of Senate debate, as I understand it.

The nature of Senate debate is not a 60-second, quick trick. The nature of Senate debate is to encourage thought, if not for Senators who are present, Senators who are listening on their speaker boxes, or staff or people who show up from the press, whoever, and listen and figure out what the issues are, not what the quick statements are, not what the newsworthy comments are but what the real issues are and the thinking.

Sometimes it is very difficult to express big thoughts in 60-second or 30-second segments.

So the nature of conversation before a television camera for a person who wants to be on the television camera is different from the nature of conversation and discussion when the television camera is not going.

Second, Mr. President, we are public figures in the Senate, and public figures want to be before the public. The way to be before the public is to get on television.

There is nothing wrong with that. It is just the nature of our profession, to try to be on television. All of us try to be on television. We want to be on television. We want to be on television so much that we have a television studio right downstairs so that it will be available to us.

We go to where the cameras are. We, in politics, go where we think the cameras are. We do things in order to get ourselves on television.

Television, in other words, does not simply report what we do; it draws us.

Maybe that is objectionable. Maybe that is a defect in our spirit. Maybe we are venal because of that, but it is true.

I will just give one example from my own history, and it is something of an admission.

Senators will recall that a few years ago, we had a great controversy, the Bert Lance controversy. It had to do with his activities when he was a bank officer in Georgia.

At the same time that controversy was going on, the Senate Finance Committee was marking up, I believe, the crude oil equalization tax. It was a major piece of legislation involving national energy policy and national economic policy.

The Bert Lance hearing was before the Governmental Affairs Committee. I am a member of the Governmental Affairs Committee. The crude oil equalization tax measure was being marked up in the Finance Committee, and I am a member of the Finance Committee.

The Governmental Affairs Committee hearing was being held on the first floor of the Dirksen Building, in the largest committee room we have. To walk into that room was to walk before all of the network television.

Upstairs, in the Finance Committee room, we had the Wall Street Journal and the Washington Post and maybe the Petroleum World.

For a politician who wants to be on television, where would he spend his time? Fortunately, the stairs were there; I could run up and down the stairs. But I spent more time than I should have in the Governmental Affairs Committee hearing, because, when you think about it, so far as the future of the country is concerned, how much difference did it make whether or not Bert Lance, before he became Director of OMB, did or did not do certain things with respect to friendly loans in his bank in Georgia?

What is the relative importance of his pregovernmental activities on the one hand and national energy policy and economic policy on the other hand?

I should have been spending all of my time in the Finance Committee, and I did not.

The point is simply this: That I believe the nature of television is such that I do not think it does any good to say we should not do that. That is what politicians do. I think that the nature of television is to attract us to it, like sugar.

So, Mr. President, I am concerned about the quality of debate in the Senate. I am concerned about what this institution is about, what it is supposed to do, and what is our justification for existence.

Should the Senate be a deliberative body? Should the Senate be a place where the great issues are debated and the course of the country is set? Should this be a place where, at some length, the big questions can be considered? Or instead, increasingly, are we going to be propelled, now with a mighty spurt forward, to more frantic activity, to the one-liners, to oversimplifications, to color?

Finally, Mr. President, it is not as though we are hiding something if we do not have television in the Senate. It is not as though we are saying to the country, "Please don't look at us. We want to get back under our rugs so that nobody can see us." This is not exactly a private place. Every word that is uttered finds its way into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD—and many words that are not uttered find their way into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. [Laughter.]

Nobody is keeping the press out of the gallery. They are here. Every word that is uttered in the Senate can be monitored, just as it can be monitored on television. The information is available. Full disclosure takes place daily of what goes on here.

So it is not a matter of trying to hide anything at all. It is simply a matter of whether the Senate should be moving more in the direction of deliberation, consideration of the big questions, or more in the direction of trying to get ourselves on the evening news.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DANFORTH. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, as one Member of this body, I thank the Senator for a very thoughtful statement.

I should like to ask the Senator a question in connection with his speech: Is there not a TV and radio gallery on the third floor, just outside the Chamber, so that the press can hear live or the TV media can present, in a Senator's own words and his own voice, what he said on this floor? Is it not a fact that almost all Senators, on almost all occasions, respond to requests to come up to the third floor, the gallery level, and to say before the cameras and before the microphones what they say here on the floor?

Mr. DANFORTH. Absolutely. The Senator has made a good point.

Mr. LONG. As the Senator has also said, is it not true that just below this Chamber, a few steps away, there is another studio where a Senator, at his own motion, can arrange to have the cameras show him making his statement, the same statement he makes here? In that case, he pays for it, but he can send it to stations in his State; and if they find it newsworthy, they of course, will use it, also.

Mr. DANFORTH. That is correct.

Mr. LONG. So Senators are not unavailable so far as presenting their view to the radio and to the television is concerned. I cannot say that is always the case. But in almost all cases, Senators are only too happy to make their views available to the media, after they have expressed their views here on the Senate floor. So Senators can so express themselves.

Can the Senator give me some idea—just to explain his experience—about what percentage of his time he spends here on the floor explaining his views on a particular issue?

Mr. DANFORTH. I believe that the percentage of my time on the floor of the Senate would be just a fraction of the total amount of time I spend as a Senator.

When we think about it, most of what we do is either in committee or in our offices. Most of us come to the floor when we have some specific business to transact, some speech we want to make or an amendment we want to offer or other business we want to do on the floor of the Senate. Most of us do not just sit around the Chamber. We can turn on the speaker box in the office if something important is going on. We have staff covering the floor.

I believe that most of us would feel that just sitting in the Chamber, listening to speeches by the hour, is not a terribly productive way to spend our time. That is not to say that the speeches are not worth making, because we can key into them in our offices.

Mr. LONG. The point I have in mind is that the percentage of a Senator's time that is spent here, speaking on this floor—and that is the time when the cameras would be picking him up, if we had them here—is only a small percentage of the time he should be working as a U.S. Senator.

Mr. DANFORTH. That is correct.

(Mr. COCHRAN assumed the chair.)

Mr. LONG. The Senator has made the point, and I think it is correct. That knowing Senators, they will feel a burden to be where those cameras are—in the Chamber, especially if the cameras are showing who is in the Chamber. To not be here would cause one to ask: "What is the matter with our Senator? There is a great speech being made. Why is not our Senator in the Chamber to hear that speech?"

If one thinks in terms of the duty of a Senator, what he should be doing, only a very small percentage of the work he should be doing is speaking in this Chamber. A much higher percentage of the time he will spend communicating with people, either his constituents, or those who represent his constituents, or those who are testifying before a committee to explain his views on behalf of large segments of the American society. In those instances, he will not be on camera. The overwhelming burden of a Senator's work, more than 90 percent of it, is work that he should be doing when he will not be on camera.

But there is no doubt about it in my mind, and I am sure the Senator tends to feel this way, when we have a television camera in this Senate, Senators are going to feel that they should be on that camera. They are going to be on that camera to the exclusion of other duties that they should be doing, not as dramatic, not something that would come as close to getting them reelected to office, but duties that they owe to the citizens of this country. Senators have a duty to help initiate legislation. We must take time to meet with our own staff to talk about what the mail is showing from the people back home and what the staff has learned from research that the staff has done at the instruction of a Senator.

There will be a tendency to neglect the other vital duties of a Senator. Just as the Senator has suggested, those cameras are there, and Senators—and I am not talking about any particular Senator; I am talking about 100 Senators—are all going to feel that they should be where that camera is.

May I just give one example to the Senator: Some time back when I had not been spending much time at this little TV studio below the Senate Chamber, I appeared and a friend down below who works in that area said: "Well, Senator, I am sure glad to see you down here. You know you will find that you can do a great deal more with just a few minutes a day down here in this TV studio to assure your reelection than you can all day long up there on that Senate floor or all day long in that committee or all day long working in that office. You can do more right here to keep yourself in office."

Senators are going to think in those terms and if we put the TV camera here it will definitely change the Senate's way of doing business. To suggest otherwise I believe is just not realistic at all.

I think the Senator has made a very fine point and he is as correct as he can be about that.

Mr. DANFORTH. I thank the Senator from Louisiana for his comment.

I completely agree. There is absolutely no doubt that some, even most of the important work that is done by Members of the Senate is not done in the Chamber and that to do an inadequate job in committee or in office work or visiting with constituents in one's office is to really shirk responsibility.

I think that a very good point has been made.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. DANFORTH. I yield.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I wish to join with the Senator from Louisiana in thanking the Senator from Missouri for his very thoughtful statement. I agree with much of what he has said.

I am concerned, as I know the majority leader is concerned, that the Senate should work in a way that makes it possible to concentrate on the important issues and the serious issues and not expend its energies and what talents God has given us, modest as they may be, in unimportant ways.

Steps are being taken to attempt to focus on that particular area, but I will not get on that now.

Let me ask the Senator this question because I am concerned a little bit by the implication that he has embodied in his speech that we are just 100 moths attracted to this candle of television. I do not think we are 100 moths fascinated by the candle of television.

Obviously, people will get their message out the best way they can. We have to face the fact that television is the best way to get the message out today.

My question to the Senator is this: Does he think that those who were present in the audience during the Lincoln-Douglas debate found that a useful and educational experience?

Mr. DANFORTH. I do think that the Lincoln-Douglas debates were a useful experience and an educational experience.

Mr. MATHIAS. That is for the audience, now, not for Lincoln and not for Douglas.

Mr. DANFORTH. That is right, for the audience.

Mr. MATHIAS. Maybe for them also, but I am interested now in the audience.

Mr. DANFORTH. However, I think there is a difference between a live audience listening to the debate in its fullness and brief 30-second or 60-second segments of an argument.

Mr. MATHIAS. Absolutely. That, of course, is what we are dealing with here.

The Senator from Louisiana suggested that it is just as good to say something in the Chamber here in the heat of debate, in the passion of feeling, and in the exchange of ideas and then run upstairs to the gallery and repeat it or have our friends in the press gallery write it down, and it will mean the same thing.

I do not think it does mean the same thing. I think it would be absolutely fascinating for a lot of people to see the exchange between RUSSELL LONG and JOHN DANFORTH face to face, and I think people in the country would enjoy that experience. It is a totally different concept than running up and repeating more or less what you said down here. It is the exchange. It is the fire in your eyes. It is the lilt in your voice. It is the kind of interest you put in what you are saying. That is what it is all about.

This would mean for the American people today, with no invidious comparison between Senators today and Lincoln and Douglas, that they could have the experience of those who were present in the audience listening to the Lincoln-Douglas debates; millions of people could have what a handful of people had.

As far as this moth-and-candle syndrome, that is not unique to television. One of the most respected members of our political profession that I ever knew just loved an audience. He was a great performer. He was a communicator.

The Senator from Louisiana says that this whole thing is communicating with people, and he is absolutely right. How do we best communicate with people? That is really my only interest in this thing. How do we best communicate with people?

Showing this man an audience was like a drink of whisky to someone else. I mean it was something that he just throve on. Show him an audience, as tired as he could be, as discouraged as he could be, as downcast as he could be, when he looked out there and there was a sea of faces, he just was filled with adrenalin, and he got up there, and he communicated.

So the only candles are not television candles. There are candles of all kinds in life that draw people.

But I think that the real question here is what the Senator from Louisiana said. It is communicating with people and not little 30-second slots or 60-second slots. It is to give people the whole debate.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I am about to yield the floor, but I wish to respond really by reiterating my basic point and it is a point which anteceded the question of whether or not we should televise the Senate.

It is my concern that we in the Senate are so overloaded in our time scheduling and so pulled apart by sundry demands that are made on us that we tend to be given to too little consideration in debate on major policy questions and too much effort either to respond to the immediate issue before us or to figure out some unique way of presenting ourselves to our constituents or to the country.

I am concerned that the televising of debate in the Senate would exacerbate that problem, and it would make us less inclined to be deliberative and thoughtful and more inclined to be unique, different, and given to brief spurts of colorful rhetoric which would maximize our opportunity to make the evening news.

Mr. BAKER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I had not intended to participate in this feature of the debate simply because I was the mover of the initiative to bring this matter before the Senate. It is not now before the Senate. It is my hope, however, as I indicated earlier, that before this day is out we may have the resolution itself before the Senate.

Perhaps with the quality of the debate which has preceded it—and it has been of a very high quality—and the contribution of the concern expressed by some, and I respect that, and the support expressed by others, which I admire and with which I agree, if I did not speak to some degree in support of the general proposition and not just the motion it might be, perhaps, misunderstood.

So let me take just a moment, Mr. President, and tell you a little about how I feel on this subject, and why I am so ardently in support of the resolution.

Whether we like it or not, we are what we are. We are elected by our constituents to serve them according to our talents, our disposition, our convictions, and we are what we are. We are a cross-section of our consistuency.

We are sent here, Mr. President, not to perform but to contribute our own uniqueness to the collective effort to formulate the policy of this Nation in public. The time for secret deliberations of legislative policy ended many years ago. The time for public proclamation of differing points of view in legislative debate began almost immediately after the creation of the Congress.

None of us is perfect, obviously. None of us is always right. But we, taken together, in the composite, forming up the mainstream of the political debate of this Nation, have been remarkably right on the major issues that have confronted this country for 200 years. Not always right, and not permanently right, but remarkably right, Mr. President, in meeting the challenges that have confronted this civilization within the boundaries of this Nation, because we are what we are. We are a composite cross-section of this Nation commissioned to debate the public's business in a public way.

The idea that we might not look good on television, or that some might look better than others, is really a complaint against that state of affairs that we are what God made us. In most cases, I dare say, it is too late to change. Some, like my friend, the Senator from Louisiana, are so expert at fiscal and tax matters that I would not dare to compete with him or to challenge his conclusions, ordinarily, on that subject. He is truly talented.

Others have specialties of interest in other fields in which they shine, but not all fields. But the genius, Mr. President, of the Senate is that we are 100 people who, taken together, are capable of being the instruments of popular choice for the formulation of public policy in this Nation. So I am not in the least put off by the idea that on occasion someone will seem more attentive than others or that someone's speech may be more verbose than the preference of an individual Senator would suggest.

Some may be more cryptic in their remarks, or more silent than others would require, and I am not put off by that, Mr. President, because I suggest that by extending the public gallery electronically to all of the Nation—and that is what we are debating—when we increase, and elaborate, and extend public access to the legislative deliberations of this body, by doing that the country will not be examining a single Senator. More often than not, it will be the performance of the Senate in the aggregate that will be judged, and we have been remarkably right, in my judgment, in the policies we have addressed and set as a group.

I do not believe we will be drawn as moths to the lenses and lights of television coverage. I think, if anything, if it has any effect—and I very much doubt that it will have any material effect on the presentation of individual Senators and the manner in which we transact the public's business—if there is any effect it is more likely to be the effect of shortening those speeches and rendering the debate a little more crisp and the prose a little more legible, and I expect that, Mr. President, because I think public scrutiny will require it.

My fundamental argument in favor of the extension of the public gallery to the entire Nation by electronic means is because I think it is the next and best step we can take to restore to the Senate the quality of a great forum for public debate.

I fear that over the years, because of reasons that have been suggested by some of my friends and colleagues here, we have become overtaxed in terms of our time and effort. In any event, we have tended to commit more of our personal resources of energy and intellect to other activities except those conducted here on the floor of the Senate.

It is an interesting thing that the committee system has taken on more substance and activities of the full Senate less in recent years, and I wonder sometimes if that is not because there is so often unrestricted access by radio and television to deliberations of the committees; perhaps because committee rules generally are a little less cumbersome, and Senators, not just freshman Senators but other Senators, are a little bit less intimidated by the procedures of the committee.

In any event, Mr. President, most of the meaningful work of this body goes on in committee and, as citizens gather in the public gallery from time to time in the middle of the afternoons, they ask, "Where is my Senator? Where is any Senator? Why are they not there? Where is the Senate, this great debating forum that was created out of the genius of our Founding Fathers in compromise? Where is this august body that must advise and consent with the President on constitutional questions?"

They are in committee, that is where they are, or in their offices; and, contrary to the opinions of some, they are not out usually playing golf or goofing off. They have committed their energy and intellect and resources to some other endeavor.

But that is wrong, Mr. President, because in doing that, in diminishing the quality of the Senate Chamber as a great forum for debate, even though the committee work is important, by diminishing the status, the stature, of the Senate as a whole, we are squandering one of our great resources. The aggregation of 100 Senators who, in their collective judgment, have been so right so often in the history of this Nation—and I think that would occur once more if there were greater public scrutiny of this body, as there is now of the committees and subcommittees of this body—should have the assurance that at a particular time and for a predictable span of time there will be a debate on a special issue. I think that would be encouraged by television coverage. I think over a period of a reasonable length of time Senators would arrange their schedules to be there, not to be attracted as a moth to a flame, but because once again they would begin to realize the value of the Senate as a great forum, and an opportunity to express views and to contribute their unique and special views to the consideration of an issue, and reduce the dependence on the committee position.

How often I have voted, and virtually every other Member has voted, because that is the committee position, without any active participation in the debate itself.

Some may say, "Well, you know, that is good. You ought to leave it to the committee." I say that is good to a point, but you should not squander a major resource, and that is the character of the Senate as a great forum for the debate and deliberation on matters of public policy.

Mr. President, I am hard put to understand an argument which diminishes public access to our deliberations. I am almost as hard put to understand an argument that would not increase public access to our deliberations in the Senate.

I think the time has come for us to take the next best step toward once again restoring the quality of the Senate as a forum and not as a place for the occasional ratification of actions that take place outside this Chamber.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee, the majority leader, yield?

Mr. BAKER. I yield the floor.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, I ask the majority leader, whose judgment I often follow and whose arguments I listen to very carefully, I have advocated for many, many years and, as perhaps he knows, that there be consideration, very careful consideration, given to having what we call committee days in the Senate and legislative days in the Senate.

Does the Senator see any possibility that we might arrange for committees to be meeting on certain days and the Senate itself not meeting on those days so that we could give attention to the formulation of legislation without constantly being on the floor, back in committee, listening to witnesses, running here and there, paying attention to amendments that are not printed, that are offered quickly, and we come over and we are really not familiar with them because we have been in committee, heard the argument for a time on amendments? Would the Senator address himself to the suggestion that I have made?

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I will, indeed. I must first say that I now serve on that committee, formerly Public Works and now the Committee on Environment and Public Works, on which the Senator from West Virginia was chairman and on which he serves so ably. This is not the first opportunity that the Senator from West Virginia and I have had the chance to discuss this and other related issues for the general improvement in operation and administration of the Senate.

I absolutely agree with the suggestion made by the Senator from West Virginia. I think with or without television we would be better served if we tried to do one thing at a time, with days for committee work and days for sessions of the Senate. I have advocated that for some time, as has the Senator from West Virginia.

Even to go one step further than perhaps discretion would suggest I should in this debate, I think the Senator from West Virginia also knows that I feel we should perhaps have two sessions of the Congress in 1 year, a series of months in which we would consider authorizing legislation and then a break before we begin the appropriations process, to have two different sessions, not in a constitutional sense but in a practical sense.

Coupled with that, of course, are the remarks I made in my testimony before the Rules Committee and have said elsewhere on a number of occasions that altogether I think the Senate is in session too long. I think we would be better served if we spent more time in our States, in committee work, in other contacts with groups and individuals who have special competence and expertise in the fields we are exploring, and less time actually in session.

All of these things, Mr. President, fit into the pattern of my general views and philosophy of legislative government.

But all of those things I set aside for the moment, Mr. President. All of those ambitions I would subordinate to what I said in my earlier remarks as the next step, the next best step, that we can take forward at this time, to go forward with television coverage of the Senate, because I think it can move us along the road to a better quality of legislative effort in addition to greater attentiveness to the debate trending across jurisdictional lines and leading us to suggest a whole range of other ideas that we might have, such as the one just put by the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, I am grateful for the comments made by the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Will the distinguished majority leader yield for a question?

Mr. BAKER. I am happy to yield to the distinguished Senator from New York.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I ask his judgment on this, would he not agree, that the Senate ought not to be continuously in Senate, as it has come to be. We have just been observing the centennial of Franklin D. Roosevelt. The Senator will recall that the first 100 days are so called because that is how long the Congress was in session in his first year in office. They arrived in March, they enacted much of the New Deal, and they went home in June because it was hot.

Does the distinguished majority leader not think that a combination of air-conditioning and television might tend to the prolongation of our deliberations rather than their briefer execution?

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from New York. He has no doubt heard the saying repeated by many Members but first heard by me from my father who served in Congress many years ago. He once remarked in a philosophical way that he felt that the downfall of this Republic would be measured from the day we air-conditioned the Capitol. The Congress then would remain in session all year long.

I trust he is wrong in the downfall to be measured from then, but the year-long sessions of Congress can certainly be measured from the time of air-conditioning of the Capitol.

No, I do not believe that television and air-conditioning can combine to make matters worse. I do not think they can be made worse. We stay in session almost all year round anyway. I think television is more likely to tighten up the debate and perhaps reduce the number of days we are in session.

I can make this representation, that so long as I have the opportunity to choose the schedule of the Senate, assuming the Senate will agree to my suggestions, I am prepared to say now that absent extraordinary sessions we should shorten the hours that the Senate is in session and the number of days that the Senate is in session. Of course, the House of Representatives has something to say about that and we cannot make that judgment ourselves.

Already in the last year we have gone some distance in regularizing the hours of the Senate. For instance, we try now to close the Senate at 6 or 6:30, except on Thursday evenings which are designated as late evenings, potentially.

We have published recess schedules well in advance so that Senators can plan on them and we try very hard to maintain those schedules.

I must confess to my friend from New York that I have been a failure in trying to predict when we would adjourn sine die. I do not mind that. The only thing that really touches me any more is when I make a prediction about when we will close at the end of the year and the Senate breaks out in peals of laughter because I have missed so eloquently so often.

I do not think television would produce more and longer legislative hours, but, in short, I think it would tighten up the debate during the legislative procedures.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. It seems to me if this could be the case, I would simply want to thank the majority leader for addressing himself to what is clearly a problem, which is our legislative process. As legislators, it is not so much that we are overworked as overloaded. There is too much to be done for all of it to be done well.

As much as specialty has always been a part of the ethic of the Senate, it has been understood that there will be those present who will pay particular attention to certain subject areas that come to the floor. It is also possible that we could become an overloaded body in which there is a great concentration of specialties to one or another person among us but very little general, comprehensive knowledge. In the end, that kind of judgment has to be brought to bear on any question of competence. I know the majority leader is concerned about this and that is one of the reasons why we admire him so much.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Senator. I am concerned. As I said earlier, I am concerned about the tendency of the Senate, which is understandable, and the need for so many of us to often depend on the committee position. That is to say the advice of Senators who are the chairmen or ranking members or senior members, sometimes just members, of a particular committee, to give their position and, therefore, set our position, on important issues. Too infrequently those of us who are not on the Finance Committee, for example, or the Armed Services Committee, have the opportunity to study a particular issue, a B-1 bomber or the tax on leasing plans, whatever it is, as thoroughly as we might wish.

In my view, if we can restore something of the quality of a debating forum in the Senate as a whole, it will give those of us who are not specialists a better opportunity to participate, to test, to challenge, to discuss the recommendations of our experts, the committee chairmen, ranking members, and others.

In deference and respect to experts the world over, even committee experts, their opinions are sometimes improved by the perspective of the generalist. I believe that is the point made by the Senator from New York and one with which I entirely agree.

(Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. addressed the Chair.)

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I wish to make just a few tentative remarks about the current debate. The quality of the observations of the majority leader set for us a tone which I think will prove crucial to deciding this issue before us today. It occurs to me that it would be no disservice to our deliberations if I were to read the paragraph from the No. 62 of the Federalist Papers. James Madison is believed to have been its author, and he wrote on the qualifications of Senators:

> The qualifications proposed for Senators, as distinguished from those of Representatives, consist in a more advanced age and a longer period of citizenship.

If I may interpolate, it is not generally recalled that the citizenship requirements for Members in the House are different from those of the Senate. To resume:

> A senator must be thirty years of age at least; as a representative must be twenty-five. And the former must have been a citizen nine years; as seven years are required for the latter. The propriety of these distinctions is explained by the nature of the senatorial trust, which, requiring greater extent of information and stability of character, requires at the same time that the senator should have reached a period of life most likely to supply these advantages; and which, participating immediately in transactions with foreign nations, ought to be exercised by none who are not thoroughly weaned from the prepossessions and habits incident to foreign birth and education.

Mr. President, I call attention to Madison's remarks about participating immediately in transactions with foreign nations. Clearly the advice and consent provision of article I anticipated a very direct and active role of the Senate, almost in negotiation of treaties as well as in their final resolution of ratification.

I make this point, Mr. President, only to observe that, at minimum, it is not a constitutional precedent that, the House of Representatives having adopted television coverage, the same ought now to apply to this body. It has been understood that this was a different body; that is, Members would be older; that they should be seasoned in the sense of which Madison speaks; and that, in their original mode of selection through that of the State legislatures, well and singularly removed from what would have been called, in the time of the Federalist Papers, the passions of the moment, the enthusiasms that sweep large assemblies which, when accepted, can commit a nation to a mode of conduct and course of policy not thereafter to be checked or reversed.

We are here as a body to give a second thought to the judgments of the popular body at the other end of the Capitol. It is our role to be deliberative more than to be representative. We remain a highly unrepresentative body save for the institutions of the States. There are half a dozen Members of this Chamber whose States send 1 Member to the House and 2 to the Senate, just as mine sends 39 to the House and 2 to the Senate. That has been understood and not objected to.

It has been part of our argument that this should be a body for reconsideration, a body to check the enthusiasms that can be, like any such exhortation, ill considered; a body where a minority can hold off long enough on a decision to let the Nation itself reconsider and, in fact, for the other body to as well.

It is, therefore, only with the greatest deliberation and solemn judgments ought we to change our arrangement, which is not to say that we should not, but neither that we should.

The Senator from Maryland, the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Rules, has as his only known excess an enthusiasm for history, an immoderation in that regard which, at this point, he would recognize as beyond him to change in any signficant degree. But he will recall the famous speech which Winston Churchill gave when the matter of rebuilding the House of Commons came to debate in the temporary abode of the House—St. Stephens' Chapel—after the House itself was destroyed in the Second World War.

Mr. MATHIAS. If the Senator would yield, I even recall the pictures of the great Prime Minister standing amidst the ruins.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Standing amidst the ruins, exactly. When the question came as to how to rebuild that Chamber, there were those who said that the unanticipated benefit of the German bombing of London was that St. Stephens' Chapel had been destroyed. That medieval space in the form of a church with a choir, had been adapted by the Parliament somewhere back in the 13th or 14th century. Parties gradually formed themselves because the choirs faced opposite one another, with the Speaker seated on the altar; this had obviously given great shape to British politics. It had created the two-party system in some measure. It made crossing the aisle a matter of great consequence, given a reverential quality to the great body, which people who have seen the House will recall. Today, a Member enters the Chamber and bows to the Speaker, just as in ancient times, he would genuflect before the altar.

But the one advantage to the destruction of the House, it was thought, was that now it would be possible to build a House of Commons large enough for everyone to have a seat; the size of the House having considerably grown in half a millenium. The inconvenience seemed obvious and the idea of everybody having a seat being a modern notion.

Churchill very forcefully opposed this decision—not because it was a change, not because he thought it would bring change, but because he thought it would bring change that was not to be desired. He made a remark that is well known in the schools of architecture—I suppose it is quoted in every opening lecture at such places—that we shape our buildings and our buildings shape us. He discoursed on the importance of a small Chamber such that, in the days and evenings, in their case, when the more routine business of the House was going forward and a small number of Members were in attendance, there was, nonetheless, no evidence of absence from the body; as one could not but note there is a sense of absence in this Chamber, where a very small number of us sit in the midst of a large number of vacant seats. He said this makes ordinary debates seem well attended. He said that when large and central debates come along and everybody gets in, there is no room for all to sit. Members stand and crowd in. The sense that an important occasion is upon the House of Commons comes with the physical fact that there are more Members of the House than there is room for them, and you know something of moment is afoot.

So the House was built to accommodate a certain number of persons—choristers, I suppose they would be called—that the original chapel provided for, and the same pattern continues in the House—which is only to say that it is possible to change the character of a legislative body by changing its arrangements.

It seems to me that we have two questions, then, before us: Do we sufficiently approve of the present Chamber of this body, the way it functions, the way it works, the arrangements for it to do so?

If that is not the case, what changes do we wish to bring about, and how might they be brought about? I do not commit myself to either proposition.

It seems to me that I heard the distinguished majority leader speak to the sustained and substantial success of the arrangements of this body over almost two centuries, but yet also to the point of the increasing problem, of getting our work done.

I know that the distinguished chairman of the Rules Committee would share profound that and devout concern. Are we sure that we are not bringing a large change into this institution, the consequences of which we cannot fully comprehend or anticipate at this point?

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I am happy to yield.

Mr. MATHIAS. I believe the Senator from New York has raised an extremely important question, and I would like to pursue it with him for a moment, because it really is important.

No one thinks that the adoption of this resolution would not work some change. The majority leader has just said that he believes that it will be a beneficial change. But nobody is pretending that it will not be change.

What Winston Churchill tried to preserve in the House of Commons by having it rebuilt the same size it had been before the bombing in World War II was a sense of drama, a sense of tension—tension in the healthy sense—a sense of intimacy, which he felt were integral elements and important elements in parliamentary dialog in the work of the House of Commons. We have lost that.

Just look around. We do not have intimate dialog going on now. I am honored to be exchanging some thoughts with the Senator from New York, but the idea that this is any kind of intimate exchange or dramatic exchange is hardly the case. Even the Senator from Louisiana has not yet risen to the heights of drama today.

The Senate was once a place of drama very much in the sense that Churchill felt the House of Commons should be. When the U.S. Senate met in a smaller Chamber just 100 feet or so from where we are meeting today, it was the best show in town. Of course, that may have been because it was almost the only show in town. But the public flocked to hear the Members of the Senate debating the issues of the day.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. If the Senator will allow me to respond at that point, I took occasion yesterday to visit that Chamber which has been brilliantly restored. There are some lithographs of the Senate in 1850 that have the look of a somewhat overcrowded salon. It had that conversational quality although I am sure the conversation was loud.

But I now declare that I have a committee meeting for which I must leave.

Mr. MATHIAS. Not before the Senator answers my question.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. My response to the Senator's question is this: He pointed out one aspect of the proposal of Mr. Churchill, which was to heighten the sense of drama at moments of drama by the intensity of the crowd but also to ease the appearance of routine when routine was in fact the case, such that a corporal's guard of MP's could be thought to be sufficiently in evidence to allow a great deal of "scotch work," as we used to say in the Navy, to get done. Indeed, many is the time we do things, the necessary work of the Senate, with no more than three persons on the floor.

Mr. MATHIAS. Let me hasten to say to the Senator from New York, so that there can be no misconception—I am sure the Senator from New York understands this very clearly, but perhaps other Members of the Senate do not—that the system that is proposed and contemplated under this resolution would not show our chairs. It would show the speaker. It would show who is the moving figure, the actor, on the stage of the Senate. It is not going to show Members absent. It is not going to say, "the absent Senator from New York or the absent Senator from Louisiana or the absent Senator from Maryland." It is going to show the present Senator, wherever he comes from, speaking, and that is all it is going to show.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. That is the arrangement in the House of Commons in Ottawa. They use the term, nicely, that the television camera is to be an electronic Hansard and to provide no more than the image of the person speaking. But I believe it is also the case that this has not always been successful. The electronic Hansard sweeps around, and it does not always work—which is not to say that it cannot work.

It is only to suggest that these matters should be well understood before we reach a final conclusion.

Mr. MATHIAS. Let me get to my final question to the Senator.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I am sorry, the Senator's 5 minutes are up. [Laughter.]

Mr. MATHIAS. The purposes of Churchill wanting the House Chamber to be small was to have a sense of drama. He felt that with that sense of drama would come public attention, public interest. To some extent, we have lost the attention that the Senate once had when it met in the other Chamber; but we are not going to move back to that Chamber, to get into a smaller place.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. A cost-free option. Do not say that. Do not suggest such things to David Stockman. He will hear about it. [Laughter.]

Mr. MATHIAS. What we can do is to get some sense of public participation, the kind of tension of being in public debate, by the medium of television.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I will look up that Churchill speech, to see whether or not it is the case, as I believe, that he was addressing himself not to the perceptions of the public in the gallery but, rather, to the perceptions of the members on the floor.

Mr. MATHIAS. I believe the Senator is absolutely right. But there is the element of the public's participation as observers, as those who are being educated on the issues by the discussion, and that is an element we have to consider.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. He was thinking, "How does the Member look to the other Member? What is their relation with one another?"

Now we introduce that relation to a whole, vast, unseen public. I suggest this difference.

Mr. MATHIAS. In that very House of Commons, reconstructed in accordance with Churchill's formula, there is today television. It is not round-the-clock television. It is television on what are deemed to be important issues. But that very House of Commons today is illuminated by television light.

That is of value, because if you achieve the drama that Churchill felt was an integral part of the parliamentary debate, that drama should be shared with a larger audience than just the members on the floor or even a larger audience than the few visitors who can get to the gallery.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Does that not suggest to the distinguished chairman of the Rules Committee that episodic coverage in the manner of the radio coverage of the Panama Canal debate might be a solution to the problem? How do you distinguish between important business, business of a nature which brings the whole Senate together, and business of a nature which can be done by only a small group on the floor? How shall we depict the Consent Calendar when our two leaders stand together and in 15 minutes pass 17 bills?

Mr. MATHIAS. I am sure the Senator from New York has observed the proceedings in the House of Representatives, the other body, and they do it in real life. They do it as it happens, and it all appears.

Suppose we achieve this drama and this tension of dialog. It is worth something to share it with the country.

We do not want to lapse into Gray's elegy at length:

Full many a gem of purest ray serene.
The dark unfathom'd caves of ocean bear:
Full many a flower is born to blush unseen,
And waste its sweetness on the desert air.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Not so. They are preserved in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as flowers pressed in a well-loved, much-used book. [Laughter.]

Mr. MATHIAS. And unseen.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I thought the distinguished chairman would have the last word. He did.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHAFEE). The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, a few minutes ago the very distinguished senior Senator from New York (Mr. MOYNIHAN) asked a question. That question was whether the impact of television on the Senate might be like the impact of air-conditioning on the Senate and result in longer sessions.

I suppose there is no absolute way to resolve his doubts on that subject. But it is instructive to compare the hours in session of the Senate with the hours in session of the other body. It is particularly instructive because in the other body they already have the kind of television coverage that is contemplated by the resolution which the majority leader has moved to bring to the floor of the Senate.

In the 96th Congress, second session, the U.S. Senate was in session for 1,165 hours and 10 minutes. The U.S. House of Representatives in the 96th Congress, second session, was in session for only 901 hours.

In the first session of the 97th Congress, the U.S. Senate was in session for 1,079 hours and 55 minutes, whereas the House of Representatives was in session for only 653 hours, approximately half.

If that is the case, then there would appear to be no such impact on the length of sessions, as was noted by the Senator from New York, after the installation of television.

In fact, so that we keep the comparisons as nearly accurate as we can, in the other body, in the last session before the installation of the television equipment, which was the second session of the 95th Congress, the House of Representatives was in session for 1,016 hours. But in the following session after they had installed television, that is, the first session of the 96th Congress, the House was only in session for 975 hours.

So I believe this is one of the concerns that can be put to rest.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, will the Senator from Maryland yield for a question?

Mr. MATHIAS. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky for almost everything—almost.

Mr. FORD. I understand that, and I appreciate the Senator's generosity and courtesy.

Since the Senator has some facts there before him apparently, could he tell me what the increased number of pages in the printing of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD was compared to the year prior to TV in the House?

Mr. MATHIAS. I do not have that figure just before me. Perhaps the Senator from Kentucky, as the skillful orator and debater that he is, has already compared those figures. It is the usual practice that debaters of the Senator's caliber always know the answer to a question before they ask it.

Mr. FORD. I attempt to know that, and I think I do.

Mr. MATHIAS. I suspect the Senator does.

Mr. FORD. But I was waiting for the chairman of the Rules Committee to ask his staff to scrutinize that and to bring the actual figures.

I would just give the increase in round numbers and round figures, but I am sure the Senator will give us the accurate increase of the printed pages and, I might add, that the distinguished chairman of the Rules Committee just advised us today that the cost of paper since we entered into this budget year has increased some 75 percent.

So I think this is a factor that ought to be brought into the discussion and the debate on this question.

Mr. MATHIAS. I shall await with bated breath the Senator from Kentucky's full exposition of this point.

Mr. President, I make a point of order that a quorum is not present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GORTON). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I am prepared to put the question on the motion. We have been on it now for some time. I hope we can get on the resolution itself this afternoon.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

Mr. LONG. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

The legislative clerk continued with the call of the roll.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, let me make it clear in the beginning that I have the highest regard for the majority leader, who has sponsored this measure. I think he is a great Senator, in all respects worthy of the responsibility that has been entrusted to him by his State and by the Senate. I also have the highest regard for the distinguished committee chairman, MAC MATHIAS. If we had to have a Republican for chairman of the Rules Committee, we could not find a nicer fellow.

So what I will say in debate about this resolution is not intended in any way to reflect on the statesmanship, service, talents, abilities, or dedication of those two great Senators or those who will vote the other way or speak the other way on this issue.

It is simply that I personally think that this resolution would be a very great mistake. I believe that it would be a great minus in the long run and that the Senate simply should not do what this resolution suggests.

First, let me say that we do have television in the Senate to a very large extent. Television cameras do cover the meetings of the committees. They are privileged to cover hearings. They are privileged to cover executive sessions and even from time to time cover work of the conferences. We had television here in the Senate when Vice President Rockefeller was sworn in. I really have no objection to having the Senate covered by television with regard to ceremonial matters, opening day ceremonies, or something of that sort.

Likewise, we have the Senate on television when Senators make their speeches. Those in the gallery representing the media will from time to time think that the speeches are of sufficient interest that they will invite Senators to come before the cameras in the gallery. There is a radio and television gallery just one floor above where I stand at this moment—only about 3 minutes away. So they will invite Senators to come up and appear before their cameras and before the radio microphones and make their arguments there.

So the arguments being made in the Senate are available to the media. There is nothing secret that goes on as far as the speeches of Senators are concerned. Senators hope they will be covered and hope they will have the broadest possible audience.

What I object to are the things that will tend to happen that will keep the Senate from doing its duty to the United States under the Constitution. That is why I object to this measure because this measure will in a considerable degree prevent the Senate from doing what the taxpayers are paying us to do when we come here.

Just for starters let me make this point: It will take a great deal longer to do the work of this Senate. I say, and I know that others will argue to the contrary, we will have a great deal more speechmaking here in the Senate and speeches that need not be made. We will have a great deal of superfluous oratory.

Some years ago I was writing an analysis of what our Senate problem is, and I said that most speeches are too long and most speeches need never have been made. They greatly slow and impede the work of the Senate. There is too much conversation here in the Senate, too many speeches that need not be made, too many speeches that do not say a thing that has not been said by five other speakers already.

I am not here to criticize Senators for making the same speech a second time or for making a speech the likes of which has already been made.

I recall that Burton Wheeler, who in my judgment was one of the great Senators of all time, used to tell some of us that if you wanted the Senate to know your argument you had to make the speech more times than one. He was speaking from the day when my father served in the Senate back in his service in the 1930's. Burton Wheeler would say that if you want these Senators to know what your argument is you will catch one group of Senators one time and you will catch another group of Senators another time and after a while you will make them familiar with your views, but do not expect the Senate to become familiar with your views when you make the speech just one time. It is not going to happen.

If you are the ordinary Senator you certainly should expect that you are going to have to address yourself to Senators more times than once just to make them understand your argument.

So I do not criticize that. I simply say that we have a great deal more speeches made in the Senate than necessary.

We are going to hear some conversation in the course of this about the empty chairs in the Senate Chamber. Already there has been some discussion as to what we should do about these empty chairs if we put the Senate on television.

Frankly, I thought about it many times. It would be very nice if we just have someone, even without television, just keep a record of how many people are in the Chamber when a Senator is speaking because it would tend to make Senators speak a shorter period of time, it would tend to make them be more concise, and it would tend to make them do less talking, especially when their speaking is not necessary.

But now it is said should we be showing these empty chairs? I have thought about it quite a bit and on balance I do not think we should for a good reason. More often than not 90 percent of the time when a Senator is absent from the Chamber he has something better to do with his time.

He might be at a committee meeting doing the work of the Senate in committee. The Senator might be corresponding with his constituents; he might be receiving a call from the Governor of his State, for all I know. But even if he is only on the telephone talking to people who are reflecting the fundamental views of the people of his State and those whom he represents, those who elected and sent him here, many times he is doing something that would take priority over what he would be doing here on the floor of the Senate.

So we should not as Senators find fault with the Senate because all these seats are not filled or because very few of them are filled. We should recognize more often than not that Senators have many things to do, and many times they are a priority over what we might be doing here on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, will my colleague yield?

Mr. LONG. Yes.

Mr. PRESSLER. I wish to speak in support of this measure for broadcasting the Senate proceedings, and if the Senator would yield for a question at this time, would it not be even with the possibility that speeches are too long in the Senate or if we do have proceedings here that are not things we are proud of, nevertheless would it not be appropriate that the American public can see the Senate—at least it seems to me, and I have a great deal of respect for my colleague from Louisiana to whom I listen, I say, with great respect—but, on the other hand, is it not fair to the American people in this day of television to see what is going on?

If our speeches are too long that will be apparent to people, and they can make their judgment on us. If the chairs are empty, for whatever reason, people can see, and it can be explained as best we can.

It seems to me that it is a very funny argument to say that because the speeches are too long, because the chairs are empty or because something is wrong, therefore we should not have television cameras here or we should not have radio here. Indeed I think maybe the speeches are very good, and I think they should be shared. But I just cannot share—I address this question, would that be the basis because something is not being done right to keep the American people from seeing it?

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the import of the Senator's question would suggest that the Senator does not share the same view of the Senate that I hold. My view is that the Senate is the greatest deliberative body in the world. Whether they have gone up or down in the last 30 years, it is still my view that the Senate is the greatest deliberative body in the world, and I say that as one who did have the privilege of serving in the General Assembly of the United Nations for a while, and who had a chance to observe some of the legislative bodies.

I think with all our defects and with all our faults, the Senate is still the supreme legislative body of which this Senator has any knowledge at all and that, Senator, is what I do not want to interfere with. I want it to remain there.

If we can make it greater, we will if I have anything to say about it. But I believe it is and it should always be the greatest deliberative body in the world. I would like to see it continue to be just that.

Let us talk about the speeches we are talking about here. Look at what would have happened if we had been on television at the time when we took up just a simple matter. Let me just mention one, if we had been on live television directly available to the people of the United States or educational TV or however it was made available to them through their TV set, and we had before us, let us say, the little measure involving a reduction of the minimum benefits for the social security beneficiaries, there is not the slightest doubt in my mind the debate would have been longer. If we had all those dear old people at home or in these nursing homes looking at television, seeing what was happening to the fate of their little benefits, and fearing that this might be the beginning of something that would spread to other social security beneficiaries, instead of that matter being decided with a day's debate here in the U.S. Senate with a few speeches it would have gone on and on. With one Senator on the Democratic side of the aisle carrying the burden of debate for the position of those who did not want to reduce it, and one Senator carrying the burden for the other side for those who did think it should be reduced, I do not have the slightest doubt that every Senator here would have felt he had to make a speech.

Imagine all these dear old people, they are very concerned, they are very worried about what will happen to them. Will these social security benefits being eliminated, does that mean others will be reduced? Is this the beginning of a trend?

Mr. President, just speaking as one Senator, I know many times I have spoken to an audience where there were elderly people there, and I told the people "You can depend on me. I understand your problems."

I could not have stayed in my seat and simply let the Senator from Michigan carry the burden of making that argument. I would have had to be in it, otherwise people would have taken the view that their Senator did not say anything. They thought he was their friend. Many times he has introduced bills, made speeches, appeared before them to lead them to believe he was on their side, and yet there he was just sitting there or maybe not even sitting there, he was not active, he did nothing, and their benefits were cut while their Senator sat in his seat or made no effort whatever to get up and make a speech and see what he could do to change the vote.

I was convinced, as I think most Senators were convinced, that it was not going to change any votes for this Senator to get up and make an additional speech on the matter. The matter had been explained well enough as it was, but with television, I would have to get up on my feet for them to see that their Senator was there looking after their business for them; and I would want them to think that, perhaps, it was my speech that might have made the difference. I certainly would not want them to think my speech might have made a difference and I failed to do so.

We voted on that matter not one time; we voted on that matter at least twice here in the U.S. Senate, I know. On both occasions we could have well had 100 speeches made or at least made more than 50 speeches that were made.

Then you may recall later on we had the same matter back before the Senate again. The President of the United States, having taken this position and having seen the concern that was shown by a great number of elderly people in the country, decided it should be restored. So it came back to the Senate, and we had a bill before the Senate to restore the minimum benefits.

Now again, Mr. President, that is a position I had been advocating all the time just as one Senator. I had made the motion in the Committee on Finance, and I had been the first one to make the motion, that this particular item be maintained in the social security program. But the Senator from Louisiana, having felt he had done his part and having felt there was no reason why I ought to make a speech when the matter came back up, it carried by a vote of 96 to 0. So my judgment in that respect was proved right. It was not necessary for the Senator from Louisiana to make a speech in favor of restoring the minimum benefit. We had plenty of votes. Well, I was inclined to think there would be no more than one or two brave souls who might vote against it at all. It turned out there were no votes against it, 96 to nothing.

Yet, Mr. President, I can see how in a situation like that, with this Senate on live television and those dear old people watching that debate, I can see how Senators would take advantage of the opportunity to educate the people back home about their position, to say, "I was right about the thing."

I hope people recall what my position was. I have fought for these dear old people, and I want it known by all that I will do everything in my power to pass this resolution, and I will oppose further cuts of this nature.

Now, we might well have had 100 speeches. I know we would not have settled for any one speech. As I recall it, Mr. DOLE did most of the speaking for that, the chairman of the committee, and that was about all we needed to hear. But we would have had more to hear than that. I should think we would have had about 100 speeches.

Mr. President, I can recall the time when the Senator from Oregon (Mr. Morse) used to take the floor and report for himself to the people of Oregon. During some of that period the Senator form Oregon (Mr. Morse) was the Independent Party of the Senate; he had left the Republican Party, he had not yet joined the Democratic Party, so he was his own party. He was the Independent Party.

Mr. Morse would take the floor on a Friday afternoon and he would give his report for the Independent Party of the United States to the people of Oregon.

Of course, anybody in the country was privileged to read the report, no doubt about that, because he was beaming this particular speech to the people of Oregon. May I say, Mr. President, he made some good speeches. I know, because I heard them.

It was very difficult to get Senators to make themselves available on a Friday afternoon starting at 5 o'clock to hear Mr. Morse's speeches. The Senator from Louisiana thought he might make a few Brownie points with the majority leader if he just volunteered for that chore. So the Senator from Louisiana volunteered to sit in that chair and hear Mr. Morse make those speeches.

I am here to attest that those were good speeches. I have no doubt that they would have been even longer speeches and better speeches. He would have been better prepared, and he would have spoken at greater length if the Senator from Oregon could have been on live television. So these people in Oregon could see him standing there and making the speech, especially if the camera was zeroing in on the Senator from Oregon and not on all those empty chairs. But I say even if it was showing all those empty chairs, it was still a good speech. He would have done himself a lot of good in the State of Oregon by making that speech for the benefit of the people of the State of Oregon to show how the Senator from Oregon (Mr. Morse) felt about those matters, about what he thought was going on.

Senators do not get much opportunity to speak to that many people. You know if a Senator can arrange, as did the Senator from Oregon, taking into account that Oregon is three time zones different from Washington, and he could make a speech here which could still be covered by the newspapers and the media out in Oregon, he would issue press releases, get them up to the gallery. If a Senator could do that, Mr. President, he had every reason to assume that if he is only talking to 1 percent of his people in an average size State he would be speaking to 40,000 people. That is a lot of people, 40,000 people in the audience, just speaking to 1 percent.

I have no doubt in that Senator's case, if he made that a regular weekly proposition, he would have a lot more than 1 percent. He would come here and speak to 5 percent. That Senator could be addressing 200,000 people and get home to his State every Friday afternoon. One would think he would do it.

Mr. President, sometimes on the floor of the Senate, a Senator will be speaking about matters of concern to him, but not of concern to most of us in this body. I must confess something I know to be true, and I think we all know it is true. Sometimes we have just deliberately made ourselves unavailable, just out of the Chamber, on the theory that if you had too many people there to listen to him, he might continue to talk, where if there were fewer people there, he might conclude his speech in a lesser period of time.

There is no way, in my judgment, and I am positive I am right about this, that we can put the Senate of the United States on live television without greatly increasing the amount of time that Senators are going to spend making speeches here in the U.S. Senate.

We have been referred to the experience in the House of Representatives. Mr. President, the House experience does not give us much guidance in the Senate. We will have some information about the House situation a little later.

The House is not comparable to the Senate for many reasons. For one thing, in the House of Representatives, when measures are brought up over there, the House is under a closed rule. The Rules Committee will meet. It will propose a rule that will say that a certain amount of time will be consumed on a bill; that there will be a certain amount of time allotted to an amendment; that there will be a certain amount of time allotted to a motion, perhaps a motion to recommit, and that the time will be controlled by one person on one side of the aisle and another person on the other side of the aisle. So, the Rules Committee will fix the amount of time that is available for debate.

Having fixed that time, then, of course, the House must conform to the amount of time that is allotted for that purpose.

The Senate has no rule in that regard. When a measure is called up, a Senator from Texas, for example, has the opportunity to speak at great length and to explain his views to all those who will listen to him. Under the rules of the Senate, on a legislative day on any particular measure, or any amendment, a Senator has a right to make two speeches. So this Senator, protecting his rights and diligently seeing that his rights are not denied him, with the cooperation of the leadership on his side of the aisle, can well protect his right to make two speeches of whatever length he cares to make, unless, by some error, he forecloses those rights before the matter comes before the Senate.

So the experience in the House simply does not address itself to the fact that the Senate is the only legislative body to my knowledge where we have what we can honestly call free debate. The Senate is the only legislative body where those who are opposed to a measure that they believe would be of great harm to this Republic have the opportunity to speak at great length, the opportunity to delay, yes, even the opportunity to conduct a successful filibuster if they can, and if they can muster the 41 votes necessary to keep that filibuster going.

So this is the only place where free debate is available to prevent the enactment of legislation which might sound very good in the beginning but which when carefully considered, and with the experience of time, may prove to be very detrimental. It could even be harmful to the future and the survival of this form of government.

Speaking of the time people consume, let me refer the Senator to another matter considered in the Senate, by way of illustration.

When the nomination of Sandra Day O'Connor came before the Senate, everybody knew that Sandra Day O'Connor was going to be confirmed. I did not make a speech on the subject. I felt that a speech by the Senator from Louisiana was not necessary. My thought was that we should get on with business at the earliest opportunity. Notwithstanding my view, about half the Members of the Senate took the floor to make a speech, to say what a great thing it was that we at last had a female, a lady, a member of the highest court of our land.

Mr. President, that was when the matter was not on television. Those speeches did not have to be made to persuade Senators to vote that way, but those speeches were made by Senators who felt they had to get up to associate themselves with the fact that women had made this enormous move forward, that there was now a woman being confirmed to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. President, if this debate had been televised, I say for certainty there would have been a lot more speeches than those made. Instead of just half of the Senators making a speech, very likely all Senators would have thought this was a case where they should make a speech saying Sandra Day O'Connor was qualified and that they were proud to vote for her nomination, that it was about time that a woman with the proper credentials should serve on the Supreme Court of the United States.

That would have just taken a great deal of time which could be spent on some other legislative matter. I admit it would have provided Senators a wonderful opportunity to speak to the whole Nation, to have a network available to Senators to speak to everybody in the whole United States supporting their idea.

I refer to the theory that by addressing his message to the people, a legislator can bring a reaction from the citizens. They will call upon their legislators to support this Senator's position. In due course, when the Senators hear from their constituents they will be asked to vote with the person who is speaking on that issue.

Sometimes those of us who have been engaged in a filibuster in the Senate have taken the view that we were attempting to get our message to the people of the country, making an educational campaign, that we felt if the people understood our views those people would express themselves, asking their legislators to support us.

Can you not see a Senator now who makes a speech calling upon the people of the United States to support his position? Let us assume that the average Senator's office receives 50 letters urging them to support the position spoken by a Senator here in this body. The average Member of the House receives 10 letters. One could say, "Well, that was not all that much of a response." To that he would say, "Oh, yes, but only 1 percent of the people in the United States heard my speech and most of them are hearing it for the first time."

Can you not see a Senator saying that if the people who heard it hear it again, and those who have never heard it hear it, they would be persuaded to his view. That would encourage him to continue until about 50 percent of the people of the United States "have heard my position, and I will carry the day"?

What is wrong about that? Nothing, except one thing: It could take forever for this man to make enough speeches on the Senate floor by way of the television media available to Senators to persuade the people of the United States to support his bill. Of course, there is no assurance that he is going to succeed in doing that. It may be that after that Senator had made about 30 speeches somebody might make a good speech for the other side, and he never does succeed in passing it. But think of the time that it would consume in the Senate for a Senator to address himself to the broader constituency out there. In defense of the people of the United States, he would be right about this matter. If 100 Senators start doing that, we will not have time to do other things that need to be done.

That gets me to another point, Mr. President, which ought to be considered. Most of the work of the Senate is not done in the Senate. Most of the work of the Senate is done in the Senate committees and in the office of Senators. A Senator will have an idea for a bill, something that should be done.

He discusses it with his staff. The staff goes down and finds a legislative technician. That person will work on it, draft a bill, the Senator reviews the bill, makes a suggestion, they send it back, they draft it again. A lot of decisions have been made, not all of them by the Senator, just in putting the bill into a form to introduce it. A lot of that work is done by technicians.

People could say, well, do you not think the people of the Nation are entitled to know what happens in those drafting sessions? Well, yes, they are. But all they need to see of a drafting session is one. If they see a drafting session doing its job, where talented people sit down and talk hour by hour about what the precise word should be in this sentence and what the precise word should be in the other sentence, and whether one word would better serve the purpose than the other word, I would say for people interested in knowing about that, that would be fine. I would recommend the television medium there. It is available to them; do that. Show the people how a bill is written by the technicians.

I make a bet. It will have the lowest Neilsen rating of anything on television. If you try to show it a second time, anybody who knows it is going to turn it off. It is not that interesting to see how these technicians do a job of working out the precise language that should express legislative intent of the Congress in a statute. So the different work that needs to be done is not of interest to the television medium but it must be done.

Then you go beyond that and take the decisions that must be made in a committee. I find myself thinking of a major legislative bill, the type of which is brought out by the Finance Committee, usually once a session, a bill that may be 800 to 1,000 pages long. The decisions in that bill would amount to perhaps 100,000. Of those 100,000 decisions, probably 90 percent of them will have been made by employees of the Senators and the Senate and the Senate committee, the staff and the technicians, working to draft the legislation and working simply to carry out the intent that the Senators expressed. I say there are about 1,000 decisions made in a committee itself in putting together a major piece of legislation. On the Senate floor, only about 100 of that 1,000 decisions will be contested, so that 80 percent of those decisions go completely uncontested.

Think of the work of a U.S. Senator. More than 90 percent—in fact, about 99 percent—of his work, and maybe 99.5 percent of his work is not standing here on the Senate floor and making a speech; 99.5 percent of a Senator's work is in the committee, it is in his office, it is meeting constituents, even going back home and speaking to people about their business and what they would like for him to do. It is answering telephone calls, answering mail. It is that broad variety of things that a person must do because he is a U.S. Senator and only about one-half of 1 percent of its is here, on the Senate floor.

The point is, Mr. President, that when you place an enormous premium on a Senator being here on the floor and making a speech, he is going to do a lot more of it. I do not see any way, Mr. President, that one can honestly dispute that fact. I have no doubt whatever—in fact, I am positive—that history will prove me right about this.

This gets me to point No. 2. What is the greatest argument for having the U.S Senate at all? We are told that the U.S. Senate is the result of the great compromise. Senators will recall that the great compromise had to do with a decision that there would be two bodies to legislate rather than one. The great compromise created the U.S. Senate different from the House. It was elected on a basis of two Senators from each State, be it a large State or a small State. So the great compromise varied from the population representation in the House of Representatives.

Each State would have two Senators. Those Senators serve on 6-year terms. The idea of merely giving more voting power to smaller States is a very poor excuse for having the U.S. Senate if that is all it has going for it. If there were no other argument for the U.S. Senate than that the small States would have equal representation with the big States, that would not be an adequate excuse, in my judgment, to even have a U.S. Senate. As one who has served here for 33 years, I know that there are better reasons for having a U.S. Senate.

What are the better reasons? Let me tell you the best, Mr. President. The best reason is that the U.S. Senate, serving on 6-year terms, is in a position to give more careful consideration to a measure that has passed the House. The U.S. Senate is in a position to give more thorough consideration to a matter than the House of Representatives. Best of all, the Senate is in a position to give a judgment that will meet the test of time—not just the test of today and tomorrow, but I mean the test of what will happen to this Government 5, 10, 15, and even 50 years down the road. The Senate of the United States is in a far better position to look at a measure that may be popular but that may contain within it the seeds of the destruction of this democracy. We have a right to expect some statesmanship of the U.S. Senate. From time to time, those expectations are justified.

Mr. President, the Senate of the United States, serving 6-year terms as we do, should be in position to do some things that are not popular at the moment, to do some things that are downright unpopular at the moment, knowing that, in the long run, it is best for the country, or with the firm belief that, in the long run, it is best for the country.

I know, Mr. President, that though we might disagree on television, I know the distinguished majority leader has, many times, taken a position that was difficult to take. He is very much aware of the fact that we hope the Senate will always be a body that will have the courage to do some difficult and somewhat unpopular things, firm in the judgment that, in the long run, this is going to be best for our country. I say that because the distinguished senior Senator from Tennessee, the majority leader (Mr. BAKER), led the fight on his side of the aisle for the Panama Canal treaty. That was not something calculated to elect one in the State of Tennessee. That was something that was calculated to cost some votes and require some explaining. Some of the people were not going to be satisifed with the explanation. But the Senator had the courage to do that and without the courageous position taken by the Senator from Tennessee on that occasion, Mr. President, that treaty would have failed.

I simply make this point, not saying that television would have made the difference. I am just saying that the people of the United States have a right to expect more statesmanship of the Senate than they do of the House of Representatives. From time to time, I am happy to say, they get it. For example, as one who cast that very difficult vote for the treaty, knowing it was going to cost some votes at the next election, the Senator from Lousiana did it because he felt that we must ratify the treaty. If we did not, there was going to be warfare. Those people down there were going to rise up; a lot of them were going to be killed; a lot of our own boys would be killed in putting down the uprising of the people of Panama, a lot of fine young people dedicated to their nations on both sides would be killed. It was a lot better for some Senators to have to take a chance at the polls. It was a lot better even if we lost some Senators, in my judgment. Even if we lost a few good legislators, that would be better than the casualties that would have occurred. A lot of innocent people would die in a battle that should never have been fought.

I felt also that if we had failed to ratify the treaty, after the bloodshed was over, all Latin America would be rising up on the side of little Panama against the United States. Our cause would be so unpopular, with people burning our flags in front of the Embassies and seizing our personnel as the Iranians did a year or two ago, I felt our cause would be so desperate for good will in Latin America that we would be compelled in the end to give Panama an even better deal than that Panama Canal treaty provided.

I speak as just one Senator speaking about the people have a right to expect of the U.S. Senate. I do not speak for the judgment of other Senators. I simply say in my own judgment, that was one of the occasions where the Senate measured up to the challenge of statesmanship. I say in all sincerity, it would not have met the test without the leadership of the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. BAKER). I know that he has not found it a plus at the polls up to this point, and may never find it so. But it is the kind of thing that people have the right to expect of the Senate.

There have been other occasions, Mr. President. Just take the situation when Franklin D. Roosevelt found his position frustrated by the U.S. Supreme Court that struck down the National Recovery Act and some of these other significant pieces of New Deal legislation.

To counter the Supreme Court's actions, President Roosevelt proposed adding two justices to the Court.

Mr. Roosevelt's plan to pack the Supreme Court never got anywhere here in the U.S. Senate. It was doomed from the beginning because it could not stand the test of careful consideration or the procedures set forth, nor could it stand the test of a floor debate in which those who were debating against it had the opportunity to speak at great length.

Out of his frustration, President Truman asked that we draft the workers into the Army and put them to work on the railroads as members of the Army under the Army officers. Mr. President, I heard that speech on radio in Louisiana as a boy. I heard the applause that greeted the President's recommendation when he made it in the House of Representatives at a joint session.

If that measure, having passed the House almost the day it was introduced, could have been brought to a vote in a hurry in the U.S. Senate, it would have passed the Senate just the way it passed the House. But there were statesmen in the Senate who had a way of debating that measure and using the various checks and balances and the committee system of the U.S. Senate to see that the matter was considered more carefully.

In due course, as the discussion and the debate developed, no one was here to argue seriously that Mr. Truman's suggestion of drafting the workers into the Army and making them work against their will, when they elected to go on strike, was a good idea. We felt that it had no place in this free country of ours, and it was dropped.

One might say, "Well, what does this have to do with television?" It has this to do with television. There is no doubt in the mind of this Senator that free debate will come to an end, as we have known it, if we are going to have the Senate on television.

For example, say that we permit television to cover a Senate filibuster, particularly if the Senate filibuster is on something that has passed in the House of Representatives, a popular measure. Filibusters are not always right; sometimes they are wrong. Just let the public view a Senate filibuster—maybe not the first one; give it a little time—a filibuster, where the leadership is striving to shutoff the debate, perhaps taking the Senate into around-the-clock sessions. In due course the public will insist that we put an end to that and that we adopt a rule whereby debate can be shutoff.

So the pressure to make Senators do less talking—actually they will do much more talking—and the public reaction to a filibuster on television, will make people say, "Senators, that is a disgrace." I do not care how much we try to explain it to them out there; we are not going to convince people who have been frustrated by a filibuster that we should permit unlimited debate, or the kind of debate that the rules of the Senate permit.

Also, beyond any peradventure of doubt, it will put an end to what we know as free debate in the U.S. Senate, and that will be a loss to this institution.

That is the price we will pay for TV in the Senate, and in my judgment, the price comes too high. It is too much of a price to pay, and therefore it should not be done.

There is another point that has been touched on, and I should like to discuss it at somewhat greater length—the character of debate in this body.

Speeches that we make in the U.S. Senate are directed to other Senators. We direct those speeches to Senators who know a great deal about the legislation before us. We are addressing ourselves to people who know the subject matter. Many times they will discuss it with representatives from both sides. They have read a lot about it in the newspapers. They have read other speeches on the Senate floor, perhaps made some themselves. Many have read the committee reports, discussed it with their committee assistants and staff. So when we debate legislation here in the Senate, we are addressing ourselves to people who are well informed on what we are discussing.

The character of debate on television will change all that. We will spend a great deal of our time discussing this thing in terms calculated to be understood and to appeal to the people back in the hustings.

The way you do that when you are trying to address yourself to a broad audience—some of whom have only a fourth-grade education and some of whom have a 10th-grade education, some of whom have a college diploma—the standard technique of anybody running for office is to address himself to the most common denominator. So where we in the Senate tend to address ourselves to those who understand what the legislation is all about and those who know something about the issue. Senate debate will have to be tailored to appeal to the most common denominator, let us say those with the fourth-grade education, because you want everyone there to understand what you are trying to tell them. The result is that it will change the character of debate.

We may have to make two kinds of speeches: One kind of speech to the television audience out there, speaking to the rank and file and, as I say, tailored to the lowest common denominator, and then, in individual presentations to Senators, address ourselves in a somewhat different way, tailored and zeroed in on what those Senators know already, so as to get the points that most completely appeal to them.

This really calls for two types of speeches. Again, Mr. President, in terms of improving the debate in the Senate, when a great deal of it has to be tailored to those who do not understand the legislation, do not have the slightest idea of what it is all about, it is difficult for this Senator to see how that is going to improve on the kind of representation and the kind of debate that we want here in this body.

One can expect, if the Senate is on television, that Senators will find it very much to their advantage to have some kind of gimmick to attract public attention.

One of those that would have the greatest appeal, I should think, would be one such as the Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. PROXIMIRE) uses from time to time, the so-called Golden Fleece Award. That will attract a great deal of attention. That is something that the public would understand and they would enjoy hearing about.

It is not necessary that it be on television; the public will hear about it anyway. But Senators will find that it is such an asset to the Senator who uses it that they will be pressed to develop some sort of technique themselves to regularly attract attention, just like the Golden Fleece Award.

I am not here to criticize that. I only say that pressure will be on Senators to do things that will tend to impede the work of the Senate, but things that will tend to help get those people reelected to office.

I ask the Senate, should all the work of the Senate be on television? Should you beam all of it out there? Let us just take an example.

When we are passing measures such as, let us say, the bills that are not objected to we call them off the calendar and we take them up. That is how we pass most bills. Most bills pass without objection. Let us say we discuss these measures one by one. Most of them are private relief bills. Those matters are really of interest to only a few.

Why then should they be on television? Why do we want to put on television something that is not the least bit of interest to the rank and file of people in the United States to be looking at? In fact, why should we put something on television that is not of interest to 1 person in 10,000? Why should that be on television?

The answer to this Senator is very simple. It should not be. But it is work that has to be done. To the extent that Senators will be making speeches, presenting themselves in this body in a way calculated to make a good impression on their constituents, which they are not doing now, they will be impeding necessary work that we should be doing here in this body.

So, Mr. President, the Senator from Louisiana finds himself thinking of the work of the Senate somewhat as an iceberg. When we see an iceberg, all we see is the tip of it. It is majestic. It is impressive. But that is only a small part of that frozen body. It is only a small portion of what is there.

When the Senate is presented to the public on television, that public will be led to believe that that is the work of the Senate, and it is not. What they will be seeing as far as this individual is concerned is only a small percentage of his work.

The fact that there is so much more reward, so much more advantage to Senators appearing in this Chamber and presenting themselves on nationwide television, it is going to mean that they do a great deal more of it, and that is going to mean a neglect of the remainder of the iceberg.

The tip of the iceberg is beautiful. It is majestic. It is worth observing. But that is not what sunk the Titanic. What sunk the Titanic was the failure to observe what was beneath that iceberg, what was in the water.

And what could sink this Republic would be to fail to do the tiresome, wearisome, tedious, and less rewarding work of the Senate, less rewarding to the individual for public recognition he receives, but essential work that must be done in the public interest.

There is a difference between image and fact. TV does a great deal to create images and many times those images are not correct at all.

I know that Senators running for reelection, as this Senator did only a year ago, find themselves amazed working with people in the media to have those people explain how the media takes all those films and all those sound tracks—perhaps 100 times as much as they use—and then glean from that those things they think will create an impression, an image, create an idea in the minds of the public. Many times that image is not necessarily correct at all.

It is something that they are able to convey to the public through the techniques that they have developed.

Just as an example, one technique is to show a Senator or a candidate for the Senate with his children, and in doing so, project the image that that person is a warm, loving, caring, dedicated person concerned about the welfare of little children. It may very well be that that person is concerned about his own children or his own grandchildren but not very much concerned about other people's children, or other people's grandchildren, so that the image that is conveyed by showing one with his own children may be a completely erroneous image.

The media is very, very good at that, and people are paid very large amounts of money to convey that kind of an image, but that image may not be true to the facts at all.

Mr. President, it is very much more important that this Senate do the Nation's business, that this Senate provide for the Nation's needs. It is far more important that we do what the Constitution created the Senate to do. It is more important that the Senate fulfull its function in the scheme of things. It is more important that the Senate do what is necessary to save and preserve this democracy and this Republic. It is far more important that we do that than project a favorable image. It is far more important that we do that than that any individual Senator or any group of us should be reelected.

If a Senator is doing his job and he is doing it well, most of his good work will never appear on television even if we do have gavel-to-gavel coverage here in this body. The television will tend to make him spend more time creating an image of himself on the floor at the expense of the taxpayer and at the expense of the work that he should be doing off the floor.

On the big issues, it is more important to be right than it is to be popular. It is more important to be right than to be well known. It is better to, in fact, be good for America than merely to project an image.

(The following statement, delivered earlier in the day is printed at this point in the RECORD by unanimous consent.)

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I rise today in strong support of the measure to permit broadcasting of Senate proceedings—Senate Resolution 20.

As an original cosponsor of this resolution, I am in firm agreement with our distinguished majority leader, the author of the measure, who has noted that, "Democracy thrives on public support and public support thrives on an open government." We in this body are already committed to open government. The public is permitted access to the gallery; over 5 years ago the Senate adopted rules to open previously closed committee markup's. Broadcasting simply expands the audience, with the assistance of up-to-date technology.

Many of the arguments against broadcasting are familiar. They were first voiced nearly 200 years ago when the Senate rules required closed sessions. During debates to open the Senate in the early years of its existence, some argued that the public would not be able to understand the proceedings. Once again such reasoning is now being put forth. I contend, however, that the American public will benefit from closer observation of the Senate; if then the public is disappointed regarding the manner in which this body conducts itself, they have a right to so witness it. If arguments are advanced that viewing the Senate would be boring because of absence of Senators on the floor, then perhaps this should change. Nor should arcane Senate procedure be used as an excuse against broadcasting.

The fact is that there are many people who are virtually interested in the legislative process who are simply not able to come to Washington to witness this process firsthand—and, I might add, if they did we could not accommodate them with our limited space.

Evidence of the great numbers of citizens interested in the process is attested to by the heavy coverage which has been given over the years to Senate committee hearings. Hearings on nomination confirmations and various legislative issues have in recent years raised questions of great importance to our society. Often these issues, which may be obscure or technical and do not readily lend themselves to analysis in the printed media, are graphically conveyed through television. The give-and-take of debate is presented, providing the viewer the opportunity to weigh the pros and cons. Such broadcasting contributes to the public understanding of Congress decisions on matters which vitally affect it.

Broadcasting of the Senate committees thus gives us a solid indication of the value of this form of coverage of a portion of our legislative process. We need, however, only to look to the House of Representatives to judge the experience in broadcasting activities on the Chamber floor. Many of the objections which were raised in 1979 before the House began broadcasting, and which some may be raising in this body, have simply not materialized.

Modern technology provides cameras and microphones which do not distract from the normal course of business or cause a show business atmosphere. House employees have done an excellent job of recording the day-to-day debate, providing the signal to a TV audience of over 7.5 million nationwide.

After the last election, many observers were seriously concerned about the low voter turnout. The basis of democracy is citizen involvement. We must not let people become alienated from their Government. Open hearings, public listening meetings, and televised Senate debates are all ways to keep Government in touch with the people it serves.

Surveys have shown that many Americans consider the evening television news their primary source of information. That means that many Americans form their impression of the Senate on the basis of a correspondent's 45-second report. I have great admiration for the experience and knowledge of the network reporters, but people deserve the chance to see more of the story. Through modern technology, we can now put every American in the visitor's gallery. I see no good reason to refuse them this entree.

Mr. President, I served in the U.S. House prior to coming here, during the very years that the broadcast debate raged. People said the House of Representatives would turn into a circus if it were put on TV. Well, in fact, it has not at all; business has gone as usual.

Others say that Members of the Senate will be showboating in front of the TV cameras. Well, that can occur presently, certainly, and if they do that, their constituents will probably hold it against them.

I think we can bring TV into the Senate and the decorum will remain. I find the arguments against putting TV cameras in here very strange. People say that it will break the flavor of the Senate, or break up the mood of the Senate. Others say the way we do business in the Senate, with the floor empty much of the time, will reflect poorly on this body. But if that is the way we do our business, it should be on TV. I think the people have the right to see what is going on in the Senate Chamber. It is supposedly the greatest deliberative body in the world, but if public exposure shows up some failings, perhaps we should change some of our way of doing business. But these failings should not be used as an excuse against broadening our public exposure. It is high time the Senate moved ahead with expanded coverage.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HUMPHREY). Without objection, it is so ordered.

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I observe the presence of the minority leader, the distinguished Senator from Louisiana, and the Senator from Maryland, the chairman of the Rules Committee, on the floor.

In conversations which have been held now in the course of this quorum call, it would appear to me it may be possible to set a time certain to vote on the motion to proceed to the consideration of Senate Resolution 20.

I would like now to propose this unanimous-consent request for the consideration of all Senators: Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at 12 noon on Thursday next the Senate resume consideration of the motion to proceed to the consideration of Calendar Order 251, Senate Resolution 20, and that immediately thereafter a vote occur on the motion to proceed.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator repeat the request?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, reserving the right to object——

Mr. BAKER. At 12 o'clock noon on Thursday that the Senate resume consideration of the pending motion, and that a vote occur immediately.

Mr. LONG. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection——

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, and I do not expect to object, I would hope the vote on the busing amendment could occur—and we can not change this now, but I would hope that that could occur—earlier than has been previously provided for.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I share the wish of the minority leader that we might change that order or that Senators might be willing to abbreviate the time for debate.

As the matter stands now, as I recall, there is presently an order to resume consideration of the Department of Justice authorization bill at 11 o'clock on Thursday.

Could I inquire of the Chair with respect to the order that has just been put, would that not supersede the preexisting unanimous-consent order so that the vote on the motion to proceed would occur indeed at 12 o'clock?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. BAKER. But immediately after that vote we could proceed to the continuation of debate on the Department of Justice authorization bill, at which time the Helms-Johnston amendment would still be the pending question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. BAKER. Yes.

Mr. President, I would hope that tomorrow morning we might address this question again, and all Senators who have some interest in this matter might consider the possibility of changing that so that the vote on the Helms-Johnston amendment would occur not later than, say, 12:30.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Or immediately following.

Mr. BAKER. Or to follow immediately upon the disposition of the motion to proceed which has now been provided for.

I see no reason from my point of view to have 3 hours of debate. Of course, the Senator from Louisiana (Mr. JOHNSTON) and the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. HELMS) will be particularly interested in that. I do not now see them on the floor, so I will not make a request at this moment, Mr. President. But I hope those Senators and others will consider that, and tomorrow, if there is no objection, it will be my purpose to ask the Senate to change the time for the vote on the Helms-Johnston amendment to some time shortly after the vote on the motion to proceed to Senate Resolution 20 or in any event no later than 1 o'clock.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, still reserving the right to object, will the Senator consider as he approaches Senators on his side of the aisle, perhaps coming in and beginning at 9:30 rather than 11 o'clock and then the 3 hours would run their course at, say, 12:30?

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I would be glad to consider that. I have to confess I would prefer to do it the way I described earlier, that is to abbreviate the 3-hour time frame. But I am perfectly willing to consider that alteration if it suits Senators.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I have no objection to the request.

Mr. LONG. I did not object to the last one.

Mr. BAKER. There is no further request. It is the same one.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I thank all Senators, and I especially thank the Senator from Maryland and the Senator from Louisiana for agreeing to this method of arriving at a good disposition of this matter.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, on tomorrow the Senate will still be on this measure. Since we now have a time for final disposition of it, I think it may be possible to take up some other measure, if we can find one that can be addressed by unanimous consent. So, I would hope the minority leader might join me in trying to find another piece of business that would be on standby for part of the day tomorrow.

Is there an order for the Senate to convene on tomorrow?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is not yet such an order.

ORDERS FOR WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1982

ORDER FOR RECESS UNTIL 11 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business tonight it stand in recess until the hour of 11 o'clock tomorrow morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR THE RECOGNITION OF SENATORS BENTSEN AND PROXMIRE ON TOMORROW

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that after the recognition of the two leaders under the standing order, that the distinguished Senator from Texas (Mr. BENTSEN) be recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes on special order, to be followed by the recognition of the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. PROXMIRE) for 15 minutes on special order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS ON TOMORROW

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that after the recognition of the two leaders and the execution of the two special orders that there be a brief period for the transaction of routine morning business to extend not longer than 20 minutes in length in which Senators may speak for not more than 3 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER OF LEGISLATIVE BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Chair, after the expiration of the time or the execution of the order for morning business, will the Senate not resume consideration then of the pending motion to proceed to the consideration of Senate Resolution 20?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Chair.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there now be a brief period for the transaction of routine morning business to extend not past the hour of 6:45 p.m. in which Senators may speak for not more than 5 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

UNIONS AND EMPLOYEE OWNERSHIP

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, on January 26 I had the pleasure of addressing a symposium on the subject of unions and employee ownership. This symposium was sponsored by the National Center for Employee Ownership, the United Automobile Workers, the Association for Workplace Democracy, the Brotherhood of Railway and Airline Clerks, the Industrial Cooperative Association, and local 46 of the United Food and Commercial Workers.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of my remarks be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the remarks were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNIONS AND EMPLOYEE OWNERSHIP

For many years people didn't know much about employee stock ownership or about employee ownership in general. Not knowing much about it, they didn't care much about it either.

It makes me think of a meeting I attended many years ago where the speaker dedicated himself to the principle that what was wrong with the country were just two things—ignorance and apathy. People were unaware of issues, he insisted, and if people don't know something about an issue, they won't feel like doing anything about it, and that was what was wrong with the country.

The guy I was sitting beside wasn't paying as much attention as I was but I was curious to know if he agreed with this. I said, "What do you think about that fellow's speech?" He responded, "Hell, I don't know and furthermore I don't care."

Well, in some respects I guess this has been true about employee ownership, but it's not true with the meeting here. Obviously you know something about it, otherwise you wouldn't be here, and I believe that before this meeting is over with, you will care enough that you will want to do something about it.

I just wonder where your members would have been if those of you here who represent a worker group had started out twenty years ago insisting that whatever your employer had should be shared with the workers.

The Commerce Department estimates that capital spending by American business is going to be about $350 million in 1982. Some of those businesses will do well, others won't do well, some will be merged, some will be divested or spun off. But, on the whole, the Nation's capital plant is going to continue to grow.

This Tax Act will be the biggest revenue bill ever passed in the history of the country. It is a tax cut in the main, and if it does what we expect of it, then overall capital spending in the 1980s is going to expand to the extent that we can expect plant and equipment to increase by about $4 trillion between now and the end of the century. The question is, how much of that, if any, is going to be added to the future wealth of the people that you and I represent.

I'm not saying that you haven't done a good job because you have but, like most of us, your activity leaves something to be desired. If you had done what I would like to see you doing, you might be the representative of your employees on the board of the company, like Doug Frazier represents the United Auto Workers on the Board of Chrysler Corporation.

Many of the companies that today are owned entirely by a few employers or a few shareholders might be owned by the workers instead, and you might see the workers moving through the ranks to obtain top positions in management. In fact, you might even have a situation where you hire the management instead of the management hiring you.

Congress certainly has done quite a bit to promote the idea of employee ownership and I don't think it would be overly optimistic to assume that Congress is going to do quite a bit more. For example, since 1973, we have enacted 15 different laws to advance employee ownership through the use of employee stock owner ship plans which we usually refer to as ESOPs.

The Internal Revenue Code now encourages companies to use employee stock ownership as a favored way to finance the growth of the company or transfers of ownership. And you will be hearing more about that from those who appear on this panel today explaining the many uses to which such leveraged ESOPs have been put.

As you know, leveraged plans are the early type of employee stock ownership plans where the company would borrow money, buy stock for the employees, and was permitted to deduct both the interest expense as well as the expense of paying off the capital.

It was my privilege to advocate and push through the Congress another type of employee stock ownership financed by tax credits. You have a 10 percent regular investment tax credit. I contended that that's for the management and for current stockholders. The least we could do for the workers would be provide an extra one percent if they would put that in stock for the employees.

Since 1975 companies have been claiming this one percent tax savings for the benefit of their employees, even though in many cases the workers and the worker representatives have not even asked for it.

This type of ESOP credit has been particularly attractive in capital-intensive industries. For example, almost all of the investor-owned electric utility companies have employee stock ownership plans financed by the tax credit. Presently most of the oil companies have tax credit ESOPs. The steel companies in the main have also adapted them. So where the tax credit has existed, in many instances they have taken advantage of it.

Frankly I think every one of these major companies would have put it in if someone speaking for the workers had just been there to demand it—just put it on the shopping list. I was a little bit dismayed in speaking in years gone by to officers, previous officers of the United Automobile Workers, why don't you just put that on your shopping list and just ask for it? How do you know you couldn't get it if you didn't ask? It wouldn't cost the company anything to do it.

Finally, General Motors said, well if that one percent would go back to the Government anyway, why don't we just take that for our executives. So they did. At that point then someone said, "Hold on just a minute, you can't take this for just the little white collar fellow. We want this for our workers." So they got their share for their workers and that's fine. But they could have had it all the time, rather than just going back to the Treasury in the form of taxes.

Well, beginning this year, that investment tax credit which tended to favor companies like electric utility companies and the oil companies more than it did companies that were not capital-intensive, will be on a people basis rather than on an investment basis. After this year, it will be based on payroll. It starts out being one-half of one percent of payroll, goes up to three-quarters of one percent of payroll, and in five years we hope to extend it and make it even better.

I would hope that when the time comes we will have the support of those who represent the workers to help move this, because so far those of us who have advocated and fought for it have had to do it pretty much by ourselves.

Congress provides this employee stock ownership by way of a tax credit because we believe that ownership is very important. The tax credit does not provide a large amount, but it is enough to prime the employee ownership pump—it is enough to provide a core around which to build an even more substantial employee ownership program.

Let me just mention a few things that employee stock ownership plans can do for your members and then I want to mention a few things that interest the Congress in employee ownership.

For your members, particularly in difficult times, ESOPs can provide a way to prevent plant closings. Or to stem massive layoffs. Today you will be hearing from people with direct personal experience in applying employee stock ownership designed for that purpose.

In Pennsylvania, an ESOP was used to reopen a plant that had been closed for two years—another innovative use of employee stock ownership. ESOPs have also been used to acquire companies that otherwise would have been sold to foreign investors, and to keep plants operating where the parent company was planning to close them down and sell the assets.

This does not mean that ESOPs are only for companies in trouble, though they can often be helpful in that connection. Regardless of whether the company is in trouble or not, these ESOPs can be attractive. With an ESOP, for example, your members could begin to bargain over the extent to which a company's investments should be financed in such a way that the workers will own a stake in those investments. They could also bargain over the extent to which future earnings on those investments should be reinvested or should be paid out to the employee stockholders.

On that issue, 32 of my colleagues have joined with me in proposing that ESOP companies be permitted a deduction for dividends that are paid on stock in ESOP companies. The theory there is that you should treat an employee stock ownership plan just as you would a situation where a bunch of employees join together to work together as a partnership for their own mutual benefit. Rather than the double taxation that exists for corporations and shareholders, it ought to be taxed just the one time that you do when men join together in a cooperative effort to find jobs and put themselves to work.

In short, employee ownership can enhance your members' bargaining position. It also makes a company more "cycle responsive." In an economic downturn, for example, belt tightening need not mean layoffs. Instead it can mean an emphasis on job security. And during lean economic times, rather than go without a pay raise, the employees could take some stock which later on could be a lot more valuable than it was at the time it was issued to them.

Should the company succeed, then that success would be shared more broadly with those who made that success possible. Thus, stock ownership can provide a new, noninflationary way to deliver victories to members. At the same time it provides, a way for them to realize a greater return from the fruits of their labor. This combination of advantages should provide a powerful new recruiting tool for those unions—and those companies—with the foresight to embrace employee ownership.

One of the great challenges of the 1980s is how we can tap the abilities and skills of an increasingly well-educated work force. How are we going to enlist their enthusiasm and their commitment? Should they be offered a chance to own or simply a chance to work for those who own?

Congress thinks they ought to have a chance to own it, and that's why Congress has endorsed incentives to expand ownership. A growing number of us—in both the House and the Senate—have undertaken to correct our economic policy to see that we create more than just jobs—to see that we also create owners.

Economic policy should be more than simply an issue of how much new capital is created. It should also be a question of how many new capital estates will be created.

I am reminded of the Presidential election back in 1960 where Sam Rayburn was supporting Lyndon Johnson. He kept telling Lyndon Johnson that in the event that he failed to get that Democratic nomination, under no circumstances should he accept an offer, if it came, to run for Vice President on John Kennedy's ticket.

Sam Rayburn kept saying that right up until the night of the day when Kennedy received the nomination. The next morning he called Lyndon Johnson and came by his room and said, "I've been thinking about it. And I think that if John Kennedy offers you that nomination for Vice President, you ought to take it." Lyndon Johnson said, "Aren't you the same guy that has been telling me for six months that under no circumstances should I do that? In fact, aren't you the guy who last night told me I shouldn't accept that Vice Presidential nomination?" He said, "Yeah, I know, but I'm a much wiser man this morning than I was last night."

It seems to me that the same thing could be true for a lot of us with regard to a stake in ownership. Ownership is the principal area in which the American labor movement has not done all that it could have done for its members.

Just compare that, if you would, for a moment to pensions. You know, these private pension plans got started back in World War II in the main. Back at that time we had the excess profits tax, so that companies that were making what was regarded as excess profits—making a lot more than they had in previous years—we would tax away 90 percent of it.

Well that led to all kinds of situations. For example, it led to a situation down at the Mayflower Hotel where a bunch of three or four fellows sat down and had a few rounds of drinks, and enjoyed themselves for a while, and one fellow says, "Well, I think I'd better go, hand me the check, I'll be glad to pay it. I'm in an excess profits tax situation and it will only cost me 10 cents on the dollar." So another fellow says, "No, let me have it, I'm on an expense account, it won't cost me anything." The third fellow says, "No, let me have it, I've got a cost plus contract and I'll make 10 percent profit."

Well, back at that time to keep the Government from getting all the money, or 90 percent of it, corporations started setting aside pension plans for their executives. And they would set aside the part that would be taxed at 90 percent. They would put that in a retirement plan for their executives. In due course, labor saw it all going there and they started bargaining and said, "Hold on just a minute, we want some of that." And they cut the workers in for it, and that was the beginning of private pensions where many tens of billions of dollars now have been laid aside which will be shared in very large measure by workers.

Organized labor did a good job in getting the workers their share of private pensions. They haven't done the same thing with regard to employee ownership. In other words, if they had started a long time ago, saying, look, we want some stock in the company. While we are working, we think a worker should not only receive a fair day's pay, he ought to get his health insurance and his unemployment insurance. He also ought to have something laid aside for a private pension. In addition to that, we think he ought to have some stock in the company. Every day he works, he gets a little more. And if you did that, it would build up.

Now, those speaking for labor just haven't been asking for it, they could have had it, all they had to do was ask for it. And my job, I guess, has been to try to persuade labor that they ought to be asking for it.

Just as they tried very much to their advantage to insist that their workers and their members be in on the action as far as pensions are concerned, they ought to insist that they also be in on the action as far as having a piece of the economic pie is concerned.

Now all this new plant and equipment between now and the turn of the century—all of that—three trillion dollars, maybe more, is all going to be owned by someone. How much of that productive wealth are these workers going to be able to call their own? Well, that sort of depends upon you here. Some of us would like to see a great deal of it owned by them. Certainly those who helped to make the economic pie are entitled to a slice of it. But if you are doing a good job for them, they will also own a piece of the pie-making machinery.

If there is to be an expansion of capital ownership, certainly the 1980s are an opportune time to make that a reality. There are many reasons for encouraging employee ownership and they are well known by the experts who will be here today. They have experiences that I think will be very useful to all of you.

Employee ownership can create a new environment. It can make the workplace into a community with a sense of commitment and a sense of dignity. Thus far, capital ownership in the United States has been concentrated in the hands of a relatively few. Almost all privately-held corporate stock—about 99 plus percent of it—is owned by only 10 percent of the people and relatively none of it is owned by anybody else.

At the other end of the spectrum we find a sobering statistic presented to us by the National Bureau of Economic Research. According to their studies, for the majority of Americans, their most important wealth is their entitlements under Social Security. Thus, for most Americans, their most important asset is an assurance that their children will be taxed on their behalf.

Well, if we are trying to build something which we can be proud of, where everybody would own part of it, we are moving in the wrong direction in that respect. We want those people to have something to leave their children.

The relative shares of ownership in the U.S., or the relative share of the net worth that you own or those whom you represent own, tends to be about the same as it was when Herbert Hoover took over from Calvin Coolidge. Those relative shares have also remained about the same in the more than 40 years since enactment of the National Labor Relations Act.

This ownership issue goes to the very heart of what sort of economic system we want in the United States—and just what sort of system we intend to leave for future generations.

Well, I hope that you will do something about employee ownership. Capitalism needs a broader constituency and its success depends upon how many capitalists we have. We ought to try to see to it that every worker is a capitalist. Just as a carpenter once owned his own tools, today's worker should own part of the machine he operates.

There are even more significant reasons why this ought to be done. We are trying to prevent socialism or communism from taking over Latin America, from taking over Asia, Europe, and Africa. We need a working model of what we advocate—and we ought to have it here. Rather than simply continuing to make the rich richer, which I hate to say that the bill passed by this Congress—with the sole exception of that little provision about employee stock ownership—will tend to do, shouldn't we instead be working to see to it that all the people share in the bountiful potential of the United States?

Shouldn't we evaluate the long-term consequences of promoting this type of investment stimulus and consider linking a larger portion of our investment incentives to those that provide for broader ownership?

If we had such a model, other nations would be likely to follow our lead. We have the opportunity to provide for that type of leadership with what we have been doing and what we hope to do here.

What could be a better answer to the unfulfilled promise of communism? For example, what if the members of Solidarity in Poland were to own those plants where they work? Wouldn't that largely undermine the rationale for Soviet-style ownership by the State?

I try to describe the difference between what I advocate in Government and what the communists advocate this way. Under a communist government, the government owns everything, including the people. Under what I advocate, the people own everything, including the Government.

All I am trying to say is, maybe we have been asking the wrong question. Or, at best, an incomplete question. In this technology-rich, capital-intensive age in which we live, shouldn't the worker have a greater stake in the economy than just a job?

Right now, we tend to ask how many people have a job, how many don't have a job? But shouldn't we be asking, even more than that, how many people own something, how many don't? And how much do they own? Because if we haven't improved on what it was fifty years ago, what is the matter with us? Why haven't we been doing something about that?

Isn't it time to look to the future wealth of this nation and to ensure that some significant portion of that wealth is owned by those who toil to create it?

I don't doubt that we will always have a lot of support on both sides of the aisle for expanded ownership. A few months ago I heard Bob Byrd, the Democratic Leader, rise to speak on the prospects for the Democratic Party and I was pleased to hear him say in the course of that speech that the Democratic party ought to be moving forward in the area of employee ownership.

Senator Gary Hart, one of the well-known liberals and one of the outstanding young men of the Congress, speaking on what he thought the Democratic course should be, mentioned the same subject. Bill Bradley, who is one of our rising stars in the Democratic party, said the same thing in a speech he made recently.

State governments are getting into it. Five states so far have enacted legislation to encourage employee ownership. Four others have legislation pending along those lines. All of them would have legislation pending to do something about it if we could just show them what we thought they could do and what we think would be practical under the circumstances as the next step for them. It is easy enough to sell the forward-looking members of the State legislature on the idea that workers ought to own some of it rather than just work for those who own some of it.

We can resurrect this uniquely American vision that this is the land of opportunity. We can offer America as a model for others. And this we must do it we are going to live peaceably with our neighbors and to win their hearts and their minds.

So the task is fairly simple. What we must do is to save this world from something it definitely does not need, by providing it with something that it does need. And this is a good place to start.

Thank you very much.

THE RESCUE OF BRIG. GEN. JAMES L. DOZIER BY THE ITALIAN POLICE

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President I send to the desk an unprinted resolution for myself, the distinguished junior Senator from New York, Senator D'AMATO, Senator DECONCINI, Senator BAKER, Senator KENNEDY, Senator PELL, Senator PERCY, Senator ROBERT C. BYRD, Senator BAUCUS, Senator RIEGLE, Senator PRYOR, Senator MURKOWSKI, Senator WILLIAMS, Senator TSONGAS, Senator INOUYE, Senator SASSER, and Senator ZORINSKY, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be stated by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

S. RES. 312

Whereas United States Brigadier General James L. Dozier was kidnaped on December 17, 1981, from his apartment in Verona, Italy, by members of the Red Brigade terrorist group;

Whereas the Red Brigade has been responsible for committing numerous acts of terrorism in Italy, including the kidnaping and murder in 1978 of former Italian premier Aldo Moro;

Whereas General Dozier is the chief of staff for logistics and administration for the southern command of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO);

Whereas Italian police conducted an intensive search through much of northern Italy looking for the general and his captors;

Whereas the Italian special antiterrorist police, acting on information from an undisclosed source, made a daring daylight raid on an apartment in Padua, Italy, and rescued General Dozier, unhurt, after 42 days of captivity;

Whereas the Italian police delivered a major blow to the Red Brigade and other terrorist groups through their rescue of General Dozier and their capture of more than 20 suspected terrorists during the period of his captivity; and

Whereas, the Government of Italy has again demonstrated its dedication as an ally and friend of the United States and its commitment to eliminate terrorism while upholding its free and democratic institution: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate hereby expresses its profound sense of relief at the safe rescue on January 28, 1982, of Brigadier General James L. Dozier; commends General Dozier and his family for their courage and strength in this difficult period; and extends heartfelt congratulations and gratitude to the Government of Italy for its dedication and effective efforts to rescue General Dozier and for its success in dealing a major blow to terrorism;

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the United States should take effective measures to protect American diplomatic and military personnel serving this nation abroad, and should work closely with friends and allies to combat all forms of international terrorism.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Senate shall transmit a copy of this resolution to the President with the request that he transmit such copy to the Government of Italy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, in times of trouble, friends stand by each other. The people of Italy, and their Government, have once again stood out as true friends of our Nation, helping to overcome and avert a possible tragedy.

Gen. James Dozier was rescued from his kidnaping through the skillful, vigorous, and persistent efforts of the Italian police. The terrorism of the infamous Red Brigade, as all terrorism, strikes with violence not to achieve justice, but to destroy freedom. Their intention to attack NATO was thwarted by the Italians' determination to enforce the law. We in America stood by, relying on Italy to aid our fellow countryman. We hoped in the ever-present hope of those who care, for news that he would be found alive, and not just another victim of these senseless international acts of violence.

We owe a deep debt of gratitude to the Italian people for rescuing General Dozier and showing the same, if not greater effort in their search for him, as they would one of their own citizens. Let us hope and pray that neither of our countries will ever have to go through this again.

Mr. President, I yield to the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I commend the distinguished Senator from New Mexico and my other cosponsors for joining in the development of this resolution. I am proud to cosponsor this resolution commending the rescue of Gen. James L. Dozier by the Italian police after being held prisoner by the Red Brigade for 42 days.

I was extremely relieved to hear that General Dozier is safe after such a lengthy and arduous period of captivity. The general's return is an extraordinarily happy occasion for his family and all Americans.

The Government of Italy and the Italian law enforcement authorities should be congratulated for their brilliant achievement in combating this latest act of terrorism by the Red Brigade. Through its courage and persistence, the Government of Italy has demonstrated once again its dedication as an ally and friend to the United States.

Terrorism has become a disruptive force in international relations that must be combated and eliminated. The Italian Government's courageous action serves as a reminder that terrorism can and must be defeated worldwide at the same time as we uphold free and democratic institutions. The United States should take further measures to protect American diplomatic and military personnel serving this Nation abroad.

I join in urging that the Senate consider this resolution favorably.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 312) was agreed to.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. KENNEDY. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

DEATH OF PALDEN THONDUP NAMGYAL, CHOGYAL OF SIKKIM

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, over the weekend, I received the sad news that the Chogyal and former ruler of the once independent country of Sikkim, Palden Thondup Namgyal, had died. The Chogyal's death serves as a reminder of the tragic fate of the Chogyal and his country. And, as a friend of the Chogyal and as honorary chairman of the friends of Sikkim, I am particularly sad.

Sikkim is one of the world's loveliest places. Located in the Himalayan range on the border between India and Tibet, it is a land of deep valleys, terraced croplands, and spectacular vistas. For centuries, Sikkim's remoteness protected its people and their idyllic way of life from the intrusion of foreign conquerors. Sikkim's rulers fit very much into the peaceful life of their subjects. Almost always accessible, Palden Thondup Namgyal and his predecessors personally heard the complaints of subjects, settled disputes, dispensed justice, and sponsored the country's Buddhist monasteries and lamas.

Prince Palden Namgyal, who became Chogyal, or King, upon the death of his father in 1964 continued Sikkim's tradition of personal, gentle, and humane government. The Chogyal, and his American-born queen, Hope Cooke, traveled extensively through their land. In addition to performing the traditional tasks of kingship, the Chogyal worked to bring the benefits of the 20th century to his people. Schools and roads were built; new agricultural techniques were introduced; a handicraft industry was set up; diseases and illiteracy were attacked. The Chogyal's campaign was a partnership with his people and was carried out with the support of the country's democratically elected legislature.

By the midsixties the Chogyal realized his country could no longer remain immune from the international developments around it. Tension and sporadic conflict along the India-Tibet border made Sikkim a strategic asset to India. While scrupulously abiding by its treaty commitments giving India control of Sikkim's external and defense policies, the Chogyal sought to protect his country's sovereignty by a more independent world posture including eventual membership in the United Nations. This proved unacceptable to Mrs. Gandhi's government which helped engineer the Chogyal's downfall, and then in a cynical act contrary to Indian professions of a belief in self-determination, annexed Sikkim. Through the ordeal of the coup and takeover, the Chogyal remained in the capital, Gangtok, a heroic symbol of his country's lost independence.

I know that I hope to honor the Chogyal's memory by helping keep alive the cause of Sikkim's freedom. As responsible members of the world community we must not again let an independent nation be swallowed up in silence.

The Chogyal's passing will be mourned by the ordinary people of Sikkim and by his many friends around the world. My sympathy and deepest condolences go to his mother the Gyalum of Sikkim, his children, Crown Prince Wongchuk, Princess Yangchen Abraham, Palden, and Hope Leezum, his brother Prince Jigdal and his sister princess Pema.

I ask unanimous consent that the Chogyal's obituary from the New York Times of January 31, 1982, be inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the obituary was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Jan. 31, 1982]

PALDEN THONDUP NAMGYAL, THE DEPOSED KING OF SIKKIM

(By Albin Krebs)

The deposed King of Sikkim, Palden Thondup Namgyal, who had been undergoing treatment for cancer in New York, died Friday night from complications following an operation at Memorial Sloan-Kettering Cancer Center. He was 58 years old. A family spokesman said the King's body would be flown home to Sikkim for the funeral.

The King came to worldwide attention in the early 1960's when, as Prince of Sikkim, the former Himalayan protectorate of India that has since become an Indian state, he became engaged to an American debutante, Hope Cooke.

The engagement was announced in 1961, but the wedding was put off for more than a year as astrologers in both Sikkim and India warned that 1962 was an inauspicious year for marriages.

The couple were also made aware that the Indian Government disapproved of the marriage of the Prince, a Buddhist leader, to a foreigner, an Episcopalian. But the Prince brushed aside those objections. Miss Cooke did not convert to Buddhism.

The royal wedding took place on March 20, 1963, in a monastery in Gangtok, the capital of Sikkim. Looking on as the couple were united in marriage by 14 lamas were an array of richly robed maharajas, bejeweled maharanis and a dozen Indian and Sikkimese generals. Representing President John F. Kennedy was his Ambassador to India, John Kenneth Galbraith.

GREATER AUTONOMY SOUGHT

After the couple settled down in Gangtok, Prince Palden Namgyal made plans to seek more independence from India. He envisioned a Sikkim that would conduct its own foreign and military affairs and one day enter the United Nations.

He assumed power as Chogyal, or King, immediately upon the death of his father, Sir Tashi Namgyal, in 1964. But he and his wife were not crowned until April 4, 1965, a date selected after consultation with astrologers and Buddhist oracles and lamas.

The Chogyal ruled over some 200,000 subjects in a country the size of Delaware, a land rising 5,000 feet above sea level in the Himalayas, bordered by India, Bhutan, Nepal and China. He said he intended to strengthen the national identity of his country, promising to banish poverty, ignorance and disease and make Sikkim a paradise on earth.

Eight years later, in 1973, his dreams were shattered by a domestic coup and Indian intervention. He was stripped of his powers and cloistered in his palace under virtual house arrest. His wife and their two children fled Sikkim to live in New York. In 1975, the legislature in Sikkim formally deposed him and abolished the monarchy.

PROCLAIMED A LIVING SAINT

Palden Thondup Namgyal, who was born May 22, 1923, came from a royal house of Tibetan origin in Kham Province. At birth he was proclaimed a living saint and recognized as spiritual head of two Buddhist monastaries.

His father was an intensely religious man and, as Sikkim's spiritual leader, preferred attending to Buddhist affairs than to matters of state.

Prince Namgyal was to have studied at Cambridge University, but in 1941 his older brother, Paljot, was killed in action while serving as an officer in the Indian Air Force. Namgyal became heir to the throne of Sikkim and, by default, began running the affairs of state.

In 1950, the future king married Sangay Deki, daughter of a Tibetan nobleman. She died in 1957, after bearing two sons and a daughter.

Two years later, in Darjeeling, India, about 25 miles from Gangtok, Prince Palden Namgyal, then 36 years old met Miss Cooke, then an 18-year-old college student, who was spending the summer in Europe and Asia.

For nearly a decade after their marriage, the King and his consort sought to bring the 20th century to Sikkim. He built schools, roads and hospitals and encouraged the setting up of small handcraft industries.

RELATIONS WITH INDIA DECLINED

The King's downfall came as a result of his increasingly cool relations with India and with antiroyalist political leaders in Sikkim itself. India, which had always considered Sikkim of strategic importance because of its border with China, apparently decided in 1973 that the King had gone far enough in his campaign for Sikkimese autonomy.

After the monarchy's abolition in 1975, the deposed King retained the title of Chogyal, which has religious as well as political meaning, but he was placed under virtual house arrest.

While relations between the King and his wife remained cordial, Mrs. Namgyal obtained a separation in 1978 and an uncontested divorce in 1980.

Since 1979, the Government in Gangtok had permitted the Chogyal to enter and leave Sikkim, but not to travel freely within the state, and he made several trips to New York.

The King is survived by his mother, the Gyalum of Sikkim; two sons, Crown Prince Wongchuk of Gangtok and Palden of New York; two daughters, Princess Yangchen Abraham and Hope Leezum, both of New York; a brother, Prince Jigdal, and a sister, Princess Pema, both of Gangtok.

PROPOSED AGREEMENT BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF BANGLADESH—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—PM 107

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, together with accompanying papers; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

To the Congress of the United States:

I am pleased to transmit to the Congress, in accordance with section 123 d of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended (42 U.S.C. 2153(d)), the text of the proposed Agreement for Cooperation Between the United States of America and the People's Republic of Bangladesh Concerning Peaceful Uses of Nuclear Energy and accompanying annex and agreed minute; my written determination, approval, and authorization concerning the agreement; and the memorandum of the Director of the United States Arms Control and Disarmament Agency with the Nuclear Proliferation Assessment Statement concerning the agreement. The joint memorandum submitted to me by the Secretaries of State and Energy, which includes a summary analysis of the provisions of the agreement, and the views and recommendations of the Members of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission and the Director of the United States Arms Control and Disarmament Agency are also enclosed.

The Nuclear Non-Proliferation Act of March 10, 1978 sets forth certain requirements for new agreements for peaceful nuclear cooperation with other countries. In my judgment, the proposed agreement for cooperation between the United States and Bangladesh, together with its accompanying annex and agreed minute, meets all statutory requirements.

The proposed bilateral agreement reflects the desire of the Government of the United States and the Government of Bangladesh to establish a framework for peaceful nuclear cooperation between our two countries in a manner which recognizes both the shared non-proliferation objectives and the friendly and harmonious relations between the United States and Bangladesh. The proposed agreement will, in my view, further the non-proliferation and other foreign policy interests of the United States.

I have considered the views and recommendations of the interested agencies in reviewing the proposed agreement and have determined that its performance will promote, and will not constitute an unreasonable risk to, the common defense and security. Accordingly, I have approved the agreement and authorized its execution, and urge that the Congress give it favorable consideration.

RONALD REAGAN.

APPLICABILITY OF RICE PROGRAM TO 1981 RICE CROP

● Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, last week I addressed the Senate concerning the situation facing America's farmers. In that speech I proposed 10 various items that I feel would help restore some of the stability, predictability, and profit to our Nation's most basic industry.

I am happy and privileged to say that some of these items have now been implemented by the new discretionary authority given Secretary of Agriculture Block in the 1981 farm bill. I applaud the Secretary and the administration for recognizing the farming situation and trying to implement a change. It was a positive step that benefits our most efficient productive unit—the farmers of America.

Today, Mr. President, I want to introduce on behalf of myself and Senator BUMPERS a bill that further attempts to help our agricultural sector—specifically, the rice producers. This bill will allow all rice producers to put their 1981 rice crop in the Commodity Credit Corporation nonrecourse loan program. At the present time, the only 1981 rice eligible for this program is the old allotment holder.

In Arkansas, for example, only 27 percent of our total 1981 rice crop is eligible for the CCC loan program. This bill would not only help the 73-percent producers in Arkansas who are ineligible. It will also help all ineligible producers throughout the rice growing areas of this country.

This program would give value to the stored rice and give the depressed rice industry another marketing alternative. Our rice market is burdened by oversupply and this new alternative could be extremely critical to our producers. It could mean the difference, for some of our farmers, between going under and survival. For others, it would afford some much needed marketing flexibility.

Mr. President, this bill helps to correct an inequity that the 1981 farm bill has recognized. Starting in 1982, all rice producers will be eligible for the loan program, as well as the target price deficiency payment program. We have therefore recognized that all producers should be free to participate.

I think the current situation dictates that we also allow this 1981 rice crop to participate. I must remind the Senate that this program is exactly what it says. It is a loan program. There has been no significant impact to our Treasury. This Congress recognized that it was a good investment in the crops of rice from 1982 to 1985. Surely this is a strong argument for allowing 1981 rice to take part as well.

I hope the Senate will rally behind our farmers and realize the burden they now face. I invite other colleagues to join me as a cosponsor in helping alleviate an inequity that we have corrected for future rice crops. I am pleased that my colleague from Arkansas Senator BUMPERS is a cosponsor. Our rice producers need the ability to participate in the CCC nonrecourse loan program with their 1981 crop.

Our farmers' situation is critical. It demands our immediate attention.

I ask that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objections, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2042

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 602 of the Agriculture and Food Act of 1981 (Public Law 97-98) is amended by striking out "Effective only for the 1982" and inserting in lieu thereof "Effective only for the 1981".

SEC. 2. Section 101(i) of the Agricultural Act of 1949, as added by section 602 of the Agriculture and Food Act of 1981 (Public Law 97-98) is amended by striking out "1982 through 1985" each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "1981 through 1985".●

● Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I am pleased to cosponsor this legislation being introduced by my colleague from Arkansas (Mr. PRYOR). It will allow all rice producers to be eligible for Commodity Credit Corporation (CCC) loans on their 1981 rice crop. This measure will provide assistance to many farmers who are suffering from unbelievably low prices and rapidly rising costs.

The 1981 farm bill, now Public Law 97-98, repealed all acreage allotments for rice starting with this year's crop. This means that all rice producers from now on will be eligible for loan and target price protection. However, the 1981 crop was covered by the 1977 farm bill and it allowed a producer to be eligible for program benefits only if he had an acreage allotment.

In Arkansas, since only 27 percent of the 1981 crop was covered by an acreage allotment, this means that 73 percent of the rice grown in my State was not eligible for CCC loan. This has created an extremely difficult situation for literally thousands of Arkansas farmers who produced a record rice crop, but have no place to sell it. They can not put it under CCC loan because it is not eligible and, unless the export markets improve dramatically in the next few weeks, there is no relief in sight. This bill will simply allow these farmers to put their crop under CCC loan—a loan which will be repaid with interest, so there is going to be little or no cost to the Federal Government.

Mr. President, I commend my colleague from Arkansas (Mr. PRYOR) for offering this legislation and I urge the Senate to act quickly on this measure. Virtually no cost will be involved, but allowing the entire 1981 rice crop to go under CCC will provide thousands of farmers with much-needed cash so that they can finalize their plans for the coming year and not be forced out of business.●

By Mr. HUMPHREY:

S. 2043. A bill to amend title 18, United States Code, to provide criminal penalties for the mailing of identification documents bearing a false birthdate; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PROCUREMENT OF FALSE IDENTIFICATION BY MINORS

● Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I am today introducing a bill to amend our criminal code, which most will agree is long overdue. This legislation is somewhat unique in that it simultaneously touches upon two separate and distinct problems; namely, the proliferating use of false identification and the rising incidence of teenage alcoholism and alcohol abuse.

My bill would impose criminal penalties on commercial suppliers of identification documents who, through use of the mails, provide minors with certain false documents that can be used to purchase alcoholic beverages. A broad range of exculpatory defenses are included which insure that only those who provide minors with identification bearing a false birth date shall be liable for prosecution, and even then only if they fail to follow certain verification standards. Several public and private concerns are exempt from compliance with these standards in order to direct the deterrent effect at those entities blatantly responsible for supplying minors with identification documents bearing a false birth date.

The problem with false identification for minors derives in part from the ample availability of false documents used for a variety of illicit but apparently lucrative purposes. By one Federal estimates, $16 billion worth of fraud results each year from the use of fake identification. And yet, quoting from an April U.S. News & World Report article on phoney identification, "Five years after a Justice Department study calling for a crackdown, phoney identification documents are still as easy to get in this country as bubble gum." It is possible, through the mails or otherwise, to buy an official looking identification card carrying your picture, description, fingerprint, signature—and any birth date you desire. Most businesses selling such cards do so without asking for any identification. The availability of these documents makes it that much easier for minors to establish a credible false age identity.

The use of these and other similar types of identification can only contribute to an already staggering but often overlooked alcohol abuse problem among our youth. A comprehensive nation survey in 1978 revealed that 48.7 percent of all 10th through 12th graders were considered moderate to heavy drinkers; and by that I mean they drank alcohol at least once a week—or once a month in large amounts per typical drinking occasion. I am talking about 15, 16, and 17 year-old adolescents. In quantitative terms, the National Institute on Alcohol Abuse and Alcoholism estimates that there are more than 3 million adolescents between the ages of 14 and 17 who engage in substantial alcohol consumption.

As legislators, we have an obligation, not just to society in general, but to all of these children, to see that measures are taken to reduce the availability of alcoholic beverages to minors. My bill takes a reasonable step in that direction. We cannot afford to sit idle while commercial mail-order houses from coast to coast make false identification available to minors. We must be willing to take countermeasures against publications such as "The Paper Trip" which provides information on how to get false identification for underaged people.

Mr. Stephen M. Weglian of the Justice Department summed up the false identification situation quite well when he stated,

I'm the shepherd of a dwindling flock. This problem is so complex it's hard to focus interest on it. Everyone is against phoney I.D.s, but no one wants to take the time to do anything about them.

Well, as chairman of the Labor and Human Resources Subcommittee on Alcoholism and Drug Abuse, I am going to take the time to do something about them. My bill will cut back significantly the commerical availability of false identification for minors. At a time when teenage alcoholism and alcohol abuse is reaching unexcelled proportions, this legislation could not be more appropriate. I urge my colleagues to join with me in cosponsoring this measure.

I ask unanimous consent that the test of the bill be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of these remarks.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2043

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) chapter 83 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"§ 1738. Identification documents bearing a false birthdate

"(a) Whoever willfully uses the mails for the mailing, carriage in the mails, or delivery of any identification document, certificate, paper, or card intended primarily for identification purposes, which bears a birthdate purported to be that of the person identified, which has not been verified pursuant to subsection (b), shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than ten years, or both.

"(b) For purposes of subsection (a), an identification document is verified if the sender obtains adequate assurances that—

"(1) the birthdate is an accurate reflection of the date of birth of the person purported to be identified; or

"(2) that the person purported to be identified is 21 years of age or older.

For purposes of this subsection, adequate assurances means an official written certification or communication, on official stationery, if applicable, from the Federal Government, any State government, any town, city, or municipal government, a physician registered or licensed with any State, or any hospital or clinic licensed within a State.

"(c) It is an affirmative defense to this section if—

"(1) the date of birth of the person purported to be identified is the date indicated on the identification;

"(2) the person purported to be identified was 21 years or older on the date the identification was mailed; or

"(3) the identification was mailed in the course of routine business by the Federal Government, any State government, any town, city, or municipal government, a physician registered or licensed with any State, or any hospital or clinic licensed within a State.".

(b) The listing for the table of sections of chapter 83 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new item:

"1738. Identification documents bearing a false birthdate."

SEC. 2. Section 3001(a) of title 39, United States Code, is amended by striking out "or 1718" and inserting in lieu thereof ", 1718, or 1738".●

By Mr. COCHRAN:

S. 2044. A bill to amend the Copyright Law regarding work for hire; to the Committee on the judiciary.

WORK MADE FOR HIRE

● Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation to amend the copyright law to clarify the definition of a "work made for hire." The need for this definitional clarification was brought to my attention by Mr. Bern Keating of Greenville, Miss., who is president of the Travel Journalists Guild. Mr. Keating is also a member of the Authors Guild, the Society of American Travel Writers, the American Society of Journalists and Authors, and the Overseas Press Club, and his views reflect the widespread interest and concern of the literary community in securing enactment of this amendment.

The amendment is quite simple. The definition of a "work made for hire" in section 101 of title 17 of the United States Code would be amended to exclude from its coverage a work composed as (1) a contribution to a collective work, which encompasses magazine articles and anthologized short stories, (2) a part of a motion picture or other audiovisual work, and (3) an instructional text.

Such a change in this definition would protect the author's copyright in the works described, except where express agreement is made to do so otherwise, while continuing to cover as a "work made for hire" such minor subsidiary contributions as translations, indexes, maps, etc.

I might add that this amendment also brings the definition for a "work made for hire" in section 101 into line with the provisions in section 201 concerning the copyright ownership of works made for hire and contributions to a collective work. Thus the congressional intent to exclude these items has been expressed previously in section 201.

Mr. President, it is my understanding that the Judiciary Committee is reviewing several issues in the area of copyright law and plans to conduct oversight hearings in this regard. I hope that the committee will take this opportunity to investigate this matter of great concern to authors and journalists.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2044

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, Section 101 of title 17, United States Code, is amended in clause (2) of the definition of "work made for hire" by—

(1) striking out "as a contribution to a collective work, as a part of a motion picture or other audiovisual work,";

(2) striking out "as an instructional text"; and

(3) striking out "indexes," through the end of such clause and inserting in lieu thereof "indexes.".●

S. 2045. A bill granting the consent of Congress to an interstate compact between the States of Mississippi and Louisiana establishing a commission to study the feasibility of rapid rail transit service between the two States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

INTERSTATE COMPACT ON RAPID RAIL SERVICE

● Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, on behalf of Senators STENNIS, JOHNSTON, LONG, and myself, I am introducing today legislation seeking congressional approval for the Mississippi-Louisiana rapid rail transit interstate compact. This compact, agreed to by Governors William Winter and David Treen, has received the approval of the Mississippi and Louisiana legislatures.

As my colleagues are aware, our Constitution, article I section 10, clause 3, requires that Congress consent to interstate compacts entered into by sister States.

The purpose of this compact is to study the feasibility of rapid rail service between the gulf coast and New Orleans. It provides for the creation of a joint agency, the Mississippi-Louisiana Rapid Transit Commission, to conduct this study.

With the continuing growth in industry and tourism on the gulf coast and with the upcoming World's Fair in New Orleans in 1984, it is imperative that a transportation system be developed for this area that can accommodate increasing tourist and commuter need.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2045

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Congress consents to the compact entered into between the States of Mississippi and Louisiana establishing a commission to study the feasibility of providing rapid rail transit service between the two States, which compact was approved on April 23, 1981, by the State of Mississippi, and was approved on July 15, 1980, and approved as amended on July 7, 1981, by the State of Louisiana. Such compact is as follows:

"MISSISSIPPI-LOUISIANA RAPID RAIL TRANSIT COMPACT

"ARTICLE I. The purpose of this compact is to study the feasibility of rapid rail transit service between the States of Mississippi and Louisiana and to establish a joint interstate commission to assist in this effort.

"ARTICLE II. This compact shall become effective immediately as to the States ratifying it whenever the States of Louisiana and Mississippi have ratified it and Congress has given consent thereto. Any State not mentioned in this article which is contiguous with any member State may become a party to this compact, subject to approval by the legislature of each of the member States.

"ARTICLE III. The States which are parties to this compact (hereinafter referred to as 'party States') do hereby establish and create a joint agency which shall be known as the Mississippi-Louisiana Rapid Rail Transit Commission (hereinafter referred to as the 'Commission'). The membership of such Commission shall consist of the Governor of each party State, one (1) representative each from the Mississippi Energy and Transportation Board, or its successor, and the Office of Aviation and Public Transportation of the Louisiana Department of Transportation and Development, or its successor, five (5) other citizens of each party State, to be appointed by the Governor thereof. The appointive members of the Commission shall serve for terms of four (4) years each. Vacancies on the Commission shall be filled by appointment by the Governor for the unexpired portion of the term. The members of the Commission shall not be compensated for service on the Commission, but each of the appointed members shall be entitled to actual and reasonable expenses incurred in attending meetings, or incurred otherwise in the performance of his duties as a member of the Commission. The members of the Commission shall hold regular quarterly meetings and such special meetings as its business may require. They shall choose annually a chairman and vice-chairman from among their members, and the chairmanship shall rotate each year among the party States in order of their acceptance of this compact. The Commission shall adopt rules and regulations for the transaction of its business and a record shall be kept of all its business. It shall be the duty of the Commission to study the feasibility of providing interstate rapid rail transit service between the party States. Toward this end, the Commission shall have power to hold hearings; to conduct studies and surveys of all problems, benefits and other matters associated with such service, and to make reports thereon; to acquire, by gift, grant, or otherwise, from local, State, Federal, or private sources all such money or property as may be provided for the proper performance of their function, and to hold and dispose of same; to cooperate with other public or private groups, whether local, State, regional, or national, having an interest in such service; to formulate and execute plans and policies for emphasizing the purpose of this compact before the Congress of the United States and other appropriate officers and agencies of the United States; and to exercise such other powers as may be appropriate to enable it to accomplish its functions and duties and to carry out the purposes of this compact.

"ARTICLE IV. Each party State agrees that its legislature may, in its discretion, from time to time make available and pay over to the Commission funds for the establishment and operation of the Commission. The contribution of each party State shall be in equal amounts, if possible, but nothing in this article shall be construed as binding the legislature of either State to make an appropriation of a set amount of funds at any particular time.

"ARTICLE V. Nothing in this compact shall be construed so as to conflict with any existing statute, or to limit the powers of any party State, or to repeal or prevent legislation, or to affect any existing or future cooperative arrangement or relationship between any Federal agency and a party State.

"ARTICLE VI. (1) This compact shall continue in force and remain binding upon each party State until the legislature or Governor of each or either State takes action to withdraw therefrom. However, any such withdrawal shall not become effective until six (6) months after the date of the action taken by the legislature or Governor. Notice of such action shall be given to the other party State or States by the Secretary of State of the party State which takes such action.

"(2) There is hereby granted to the Governor, to the members of the Commission for Louisiana, and to the compact administrator all the powers provided for in the compact and in this section. All officers of the State of Mississippi are hereby authorized and directed to do all things falling within their respective jurisdictions which are necessary or incidental to carrying out the purpose of the compact.".

SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this Act is expressly reserved.●

Mr. RIEGLE (for himself and Mr. LEVIN):

S. 2047. A bill to amend the Federal Unemployment Tax Act to repeal the penalty provision relating to employers in States with outstanding loan balances, and to suspend loan repayment and interest requirements for States having a high unemployment rate; to the Committee on Finance.

OUTSTANDING LOAN BALANCES UNDER THE FEDERAL UNEMPLOYMENT TAX ACT

● Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, I am today introducing legislation to provide much-needed relief from burdensome penalty taxes facing employers in Michigan and other States with outstanding loans from the Federal Government to finance their unemployment insurance systems.

In my opinion, the unemployment compensation program in Michigan and in many other Northeastern and Midwestern States is today facing the greatest crisis of its more than 40-year history.

Ever since it was conceived in the depths of the Great Depression, the unemployment compensation program has played a critical role in providing income support to workers who have lost their jobs and in stabilizing the national economy by cushioning the impact of high unemployment. But today this system is staggering under the burden of repaying loans incurred to finance benefits during the string of recessions in the seventies and early eighties.

States whose unemployment insurance trust funds are inadequate to meet benefit payments may borrow from the Federal Government for this purpose. My own State of Michigan, which has endured 24 consecutive months of double digit unemployment, has been forced to borrow some $1.2 billion from the Federal Government since January 1980, and anticipates that its total borrowing will reach $1.5 billion by the end of 1982. Although Michigan has received similar advances in the past and repaid them on time, this time the prospects for repayment in the immediate future are bleak. Michigan is not the only State which has been forced to borrow in order to meet benefit payments. The outstanding indebtedness of the States to the Federal Government today stands at more than $6.696 billion.

The following table illustrates the dimensions of the problem.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a table showing the dimensions of this problem be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the table was ordered printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[1] Indicates States in which employers are subject to penalty tax.

Source: Unemployment Insurance Service Division of State Program Management Tax Administration Group, Jan. 31, 1982.

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, under the present structure of the unemployment compensation program, employers in States which fail to repay outstanding loans within 2 years are subject to an additional penalty tax of 0.3 percent in every year in which the loan is not repaid. These penalty taxes, especially when added to increased social security payroll taxes, add to the cost of labor and will seriously dampen the prospects for economic recovery in the affected States. To date, employers in 11 States and jurisdictions—Connecticut, Delaware, District of Columbia, Illinois, Maine, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Puerto Rico, Rhode Island, Vermont, and the Virgin Islands—are subject to the penalty tax. And employers in Michigan and other States face the imposition of the penalty tax next year, unless these States can repay their loan in a timely fashion, a difficult if not impossible undertaking at a time when the Nation is reeling from the severest and deepest unemployment since the Great Depression.

The present financing system for the unemployment compensation program undermines the very economic stabilization which the program was originally designed to provide. At the same point when the economy is struggling to cope with the impact of high unemployment, we require that payroll taxes be raised to meet outstanding debt. These increased payroll taxes discourage new hiring and inflate the prices of goods and services. This is, quite simply, perverse economic policy.

This perverse economic impact is particularly keenly felt in States such as Michigan, which traditionally experience unemployment rates far in excess of those in other States and which suffers from very severe joblessness for longer periods of time than other regions of the country. Michigan's unemployment rate, for example, has exceeded 10 percent for 24 consecutive months and presently stands at 15.1 percent.

Something must be done and be done quickly. The financing structure of the unemployment compensation program was never designed to deal with the kind of sustained, severe unemployment which Michigan and to a lesser extent, other industrial states have experienced in the last number of years.

The long-term answer, I believe, lies in a system of Federal cost-equalization, supported by general revenues. Such a system would provide Federal financing for a share of basic unemployment benefits whenever a State's unemployment level exceeded specified levels. Such a system would dramatically reduce the need for States like Michigan to go into debt in order to meet benefit payments. Such a system would help to equalize the burden of unemployment, which is presently borne far more heavily by some States than by others. It is unfair and economically unwise to ask States such as Michigan to bear the burden alone of catastrophic unemployment, particularly when the responsibility for that unemployment, to a significant degree, is the result of national economic policies and factors.

In both the 95th and 96th Congresses, I joined with Senator Javits in introducing such cost equalization legislation. I remain convinced that this is the best and soundest long-term approach. But I am realistic and know that such far-reaching reform legislation stands little practical chance of enactment under current circumstances. We must therefore look to an interim approach to alleviate the crisis facing Michigan and other States in respect to their unemployment insurance debt.

Last year, the Congress acted to put a ceiling on the escalation of the penalty tax under certain circumstances. That legislation provided that the penalty tax would be capped at 0.6 percent, provided that the State maintains its current tax effort and takes no action resulting in a net decrease in the solvency of the State's unemployment compensation system. For taxable years 1983–87, a State must meet the following additional requirements in order to qualify for the 0.6 percent cap on the penalty tax:

The State unemployment insurance tax rate must equal or exceed the average benefit cost ratio for calendar years in the 5-year period ending with the last calendar year preceding the taxable year, and

The State's outstanding loan balance must not increase.

While this was an important and useful step, it is not, in my view, a sufficient response to the problem. Furthermore, the same legislation which capped the escalating penalty tax also provided for the first time that interest at the rate of 10 percent would be assessed against a State's outstanding loan balances, effective for any loans incurred on or after April 1982—thereby adding to the problem.

The legislation I am offering today is designed to offer more significant relief to those States whose unemployment is especially severe. My bill has three major components. First, it provides for a moratorium on the repayment of an outstanding debt in any State which has an insured unemployment rate of 5 percent or more. The moratorium remains in effect so long as the State's insured unemployment exceeds the specified level. Second, the bill waives the assessment of interest on any outstanding balance during any period when the State's insured unemployment rate exceeds 5 percent. Finally the bill provides, effective March 1982, that no new penalty taxes could be imposed and that the penalty taxes now in effect in 11 States and jurisdictions would be lifted.

Although my bill provides that no interest will be assessed during periods of high unemployment, it does not eliminate the requirement that States pay interest on their debt so long as the State's unemployment is below the threshold point. By retaining the interest requirement, I believe that States will have a sufficient incentive to repay their debt in a timely manner. This incentive is far better than the current system of escalating penalty taxes, which penalizes employers and creates an adverse economic climate for development and recovery.

In introducing this legislation, I have outlined what I believe is a more sensible and less economically punitive approach to the unemployment insurance debt problem. I feel strongly that this issue must be more comprehensively addressed by the Congress than it has been to date, if long-term economic recovery in the industrial States is to become a reality. I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting this legislation.●

● Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I would like to take this opportunity to speak in behalf of legislation, which was introduced today by my colleague from Michigan, Senator RIEGLE, and which I am pleased to cosponsor. This legislation will prevent States, such as Michigan, from being hit with increases in unemployment insurance taxes and with interest payments on Federal loans to the State unemployment trust funds. These States are among those which have been experiencing chronically high levels of unemployment and which are already bearing the brunt of the Reagan administration's spending cuts.

To increase the net Federal Unemployment Tax Act (FUTA) tax rate which employers must pay at a time of high statewide unemployment is illogical because instead of encouraging jobs to move into the State, and thereby alleviate unemployment, it acts as a disincentive for employers to come or stay. Yet this is what the current law is doing to nine States and two jurisdictions, and risks doing to six more States, including Michigan which is now leading the Nation with a 14.4-percent unemployment rate. For example, the current FUTA rate which employers must pay is 3.4 percent of each employees first $6,000 of earnings. An employer is allowed a 2.7-percent tax credit, which reduces the gross tax rate of 3.4 percent to a net tax rate of 0.7 percent. However, due to the high rate of unemployment in Michigan, brought on primarily by the effect of high interest rates on automotive sales, the Michigan unemployment fund has been exhausted and Michigan has had to borrow over $1 billion from the Federal Government since 1979. According to the current law, if a Federal loan to a State is outstanding for two consecutive Januarys, and is not fully repaid by the State by November 10 of the second year, then the employers in that State become subject to an unemployment tax penalty—a 0.3 percent reduction from the 2.7 percent tax credit beginning with the second year, although employers have until January 31 of the next year to pay the additional taxes. In Michigan's case this means that if this depression ridden State, with some localities suffering as much as 25 percent unemployment, does not fully repay a $1.2 billion loan by November 10 of this year, then the unemployment insurance tax on its employers will increase by 0.3 percent.

The President is fond of saying that unemployed individuals can vote with their feet and move to look for a new job. I think that is an unacceptable and callous solution. But when a Federal law encourages businesses to do the same, it is nothing less than a formula for making an economic wasteland out of the once burgeoning industrial heartland of our country and must be changed. This legislation would bring an end to this illogic by repealing the unemployment penalty tax.

This bill also deals with two other problems with the unemployment compensation law which were created by the Omnibus Reconciliation Act of 1981. First, starting April 1, 1982, States which take new loans from the Federal Government to finance their unemployment insurance programs must pay interest on those loans that are not repaid by the end of the fiscal year in which they were obtained. The interest rate on these loans can be up to 10 percent. As a theoretical scheme, I can understand why the Federal Government might want to impose interest on these loans as a way to encourage them to be repaid. But as with so much of the Reagan program, it is the product of theorists who have forgetten that spending cuts do not operate in a vacuum, but instead sting there victims. A State such as Michigan which is suffering from depression levels of unemployment, experiences a drop off in tax revenues and increases in social services spending. As a result, while on the one hand it is among the most likely to have the need to borrow from the Federal Government to finance its unemployment insurance program, on the other hand it is among the least able to afford to pay interest on that loan. This bill strikes a reasonable balance by excusing a State from accruing interest on Federal loans for those periods when the insured unemployment rate in that State is equal to or exceeds 5 percent.

The insured unemployment rate is usually 3 to 4 percentage points below the total unemployment rate because most of the new entrants and reentrants into the labor force who are counted in total unemployment do not have enough recent employment and earnings to be covered by unemployment insurance.

The second problem created by the Omnibus Reconciliation Act, which this legislation corrects, deals with how the insured unemployment rate is calculated. Under the reconciliation bill, claimants for extended benefits—the 13 weeks of unemployment benefits which the individuals in some States are eligible for following the regular 26-week program—are no longer included in the calculation of the insured unemployed population. This has let to the extended benefits in a state triggering off sooner than they otherwise would. The administration argued that excluding extended benefit claimants would correct several "anomalies" in the prior law. However, in a analysis of the administration's proposal before its passage, a report by the Library of Congress stated, "None of the anomalies will be elminiated, however by the proposed change." What the administration's plan did succeed in doing was to disqualify the unemployed in Michigan for instance from receiving extended benefits in spite of Michigan's desperate economic condition. This bill will include claimants for extended benefits in the determination of a States insured unemployment rate.

Therefore, Mr. President, this legislation deserves the support of this body. At the appropriate time I will seek to discuss at length the devastating impact of unemployment in Michigan and force an equitable resolution of these issues.●

By Mr. CRANSTON (for himself, Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. MATSUNAGA, Mr. DECONCINI, and Mr. MITCHELL):

S. 2048. A bill to amend title 38, United States Code, to restore eligibility for burial benefits in the case of certain veterans of war whose bodies are not claimed, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

ELIGIBILITY FOR BURIAL BENEFITS

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I am introducing today S. 2048, a bill to restore VA burial benefits in the cases of certain veterans of war whose bodies are not claimed. Joining with me in introducing this bill are Senators RANDOLPH, MATSUNAGA, DECONCINI, and MITCHELL.

Mr. President, last year, pursuant to the requirement in the first concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1982 that the House and Senate Committees on Veterans' Affairs recommend legislative savings totaling $110 million in fiscal year 1982, the committees recommended certain reductions in the Veterans' Administration $300 burial benefit. Subsequently, the Congress approved legislation as part of the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1981—Public Law 97-35—to restrict eligibility for this burial allowance to veterans who at the time of death are in receipt of either VA service-connected disability compensation or VA need-based, non-service connected disability pension. Previously, this benefit was available for any veteran who died from a service-connected disability, who had been discharged from the service for a service-connected disability, or who had served at any time during a period of war. This restriction was made effective with respect to deaths occurring after September 30, 1981. No restrictions were placed on either the $150 plot allowance or on the $1,100 allowance that is payable, in lieu of the $300 benefit and the plot allowance, to the survivors of a veteran who dies from a service-connected disability.

According to the Congressional Budget Office, this legislation will result in savings of $75 million in fiscal year 1982. In my opinion, it was preferable to make the bulk of the required fiscal year 1982 savings by pruning this benefit—rather than benefits for living persons—in a way that is consistent with the priorities we place on veterans with service-connected disabilities and needy veterans of wartime service.

However, it should be remembered, Mr. President, that the Senate-passed provision—in the development of which I was deeply involved—retained eligibility for wartime veterans who, even though not in receipt of pension, would have met the VA pension income standards.

This eligibility for those who came to be known as pension-income eligibles was dropped in negotiations with the House because of the disproportionately high administrative cost associated with making income determinations retroactively. In fact, we were advised by the VA that, if enacted, this provision would result in total administrative costs that would exceed the total amount of benefits paid on that basis because each claim filed for benefits on that ground would have to be developed even though it was anticipated that few would be paid.

Last month, it was reported that in my home State of California, the bodies of 30 destitute veterans were being held in the Los Angeles County morgue because Federal funds were not available for their burials. On the basis of these reports, I was in touch with the VA and the county of Los Angeles, and although what I found was a problem significantly smaller than what had been reported in the press, the problem that potentially exists is a real one that should be addressed by remedial legislation. If it is not, a number of destitute wartime veterans will be relegated each year to a pauper's burial, which often means cremation with the remains placed in a common grave. It was to prevent this very result—the Nation's war veterans being subjected to pauper's burials—that VA burial benefits legislation was originally enacted.

Mr. President, at this time, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the RECORD a copy of a January 19 "white paper" I received from the VA regarding the status of the 30 bodies reported to be held in the Los Angeles morgue.

There being no objection, the document was printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DOCUMENT

Los Angeles Coroners office reported they are holding 400 unclaimed bodies.

Tentative identification has been made that 30 bodies may be those of veterans.

Of the 30, 12 have not been identified by the FBI as veterans.

The breakout for the remaining 18 is as follows:

1—Benefits paid.

5—Death prior to 10-1-81.

4—On C&P rolls at time of death.

1—Not eligible—death after 10-1-81 and not drawing benefits.

1—Not eligible had only Peacetime Service.

1—Not eligible because of Character of Discharge.

5—Awaiting service information and deaths prior to 10-1-81.

18—Total of known veterans.

JOHN W. HAGAN, Jr.,
Deputy Chief Benefits Director.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, based on these data, only one of the 30 bodies in the Los Angeles morgue was that of a veteran who had been made ineligible for burial benefits as a result of the provisions enacted in Public Law 97-35. Since that time, however, three additional, apparently impoverished, veterans have died who have been determined to be ineligible for burial benefits because of the new law. Just yesterday, in fact, a public funeral service was held for them in Los Angeles.

Mr. President, although the magnitude of the problem nationwide is not yet fully documented, other data from the VA suggests that this problem may also exist to a lesser extent in San Francisco as well as in other metropolitan areas.

I do not believe that any destitute wartime veteran should be denied a decent funeral. Clearly, our intent in preserving eligibility for VA pensioners was to provide for those who are needy. With respect to what appears to be a relatively small number of destitute wartime veterans who—for various reasons such as not meeting the total disability requirement, failure to meet a 90-day service requirement, or failure to make application—are not in receipt of VA need-based pension, we believe that a cost effective and compassionate approach to providing this benefit is possible.

Mr. President, the measure we are introducing today would address this problem by providing that a deceased veteran of any war—that is, as under pre-Reconciliation-Act law, an individual who served on active duty during a period of war and who was discharged under conditions other than dishonorable—would be deemed to have been in receipt of pension and thus eligible for the $300 burial benefit if a State, county, or city certifies to the VA that no next of kin or other person has claimed the veteran's body, if the State, county, or city has assumed the responsibility for the burial and funeral expenses of the veteran, and the amount of funds or resources available to the State, county, or city from other sources is insufficient to cover the burial and funeral expenses. In these cases, the State or political subdivision would be paid the lesser of $300 or the cost of the burial and funeral expenses actually incurred by it.

This measure, which would not restore benefits across the board and thus provide for the benefit for those who are not needy, would be retroactive with respect to deaths occurring after September 30, 1981, and address the problem of deceased, destitute veterans in an equitable fashion. Further, unlike the "pension-income eligible" criterion I discussed earlier, it would be a cost-effective approach since it would avoid the administrative cost associated with the VA making determinations of deceased veterans' incomes.

Although a formal cost estimate of our proposal has not yet been developed, I feel certain that it would be substantially less than the $12.4 million cost associated with the pension-income eligible approach, and far less than the $75 million needed for full restoration of burial benefits for all veterans.

Thus, Mr. President, what this legislation would accomplish—at a minimum cost—would be to help insure that VA burial benefits continue to serve the primary purpose for which they were enacted—that is, to provide assurance that wartime veterans, those who served the Nation in its hours of great need, are finally laid to rest with the dignity they earned.

Mr. President, we intend to press for early enacted of this amendment, and we hope others in this body who share our concerns will join with us in this effort.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that the text of the bill and document showing the changes it would make in existing law be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill and document were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2048

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) section 902 of title 38, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

TITLE 38—VETERANS' BENEFITS

* * * * *

CHAPTER 23—BURIAL BENEFITS

* * * * *

§ 902. Funeral expenses

(a) When a veteran dies who was in receipt of compensation (or but for the receipt of retirement pay would have been entitled to compensation) or in receipt of pension, the Administrator, in the Administrator's discretion, having due regard to the circumstances in each case, may pay a sum not exceeding $300 to such person as the Administrator prescribes to cover the burial and funeral expenses of the deceased veteran and the expense of preparing the body and transporting it to the place of burial. For the purpose of this subsection, the term "veteran" includes a person who died during a period deemed to be active military, naval, or air service under section 106(c) of this title.

(b) Except as hereafter provided in this subsection, no deduction shall be made from the burial allowance because of the veteran's net assets at the time of the death of such veteran, or because of any contribution from any source toward the burial and funeral expenses (including transportation) unless the amount of expenses incurred is covered by the amount actually paid therefor by the United States, a State, any agency or political subdivision of the United States, or of a State, or the employer of the deceased veteran. No claim shall be allowed (1) for more than the difference between the entire amount of the expenses incurred and the amount paid by any or all of the foregoing, or (2) when the burial allowance would revert to the funds of a public or private organization or would discharge such an organization's obligation without payment. The burial allowance or any part thereof shall not be paid in any case where specific provision is otherwise made for payment of expenses of funeral, transportation, and interment under any other Act.

(c)(1) For the purposes of this section, a deceased veteran of any war shall be deemed to have been in receipt of pension at the time of such veteran's death if a State or political subdivision of a State certifies in writing to the Administrator that—

(A) there is no next of kin or other person claiming the body of such deceased veteran;

(B) such State or political subdivision has assumed responsibility for the burial and funeral expenses of such deceased veteran; and

(C) there is not available, other than from such State or political subdivision, an amount of resources or funds sufficient to cover the burial and funeral expenses of such deceased veteran.

(2) The payment made on behalf of such deceased veteran under subsection (a) of this section as a result of paragraph (1) of this subsection shall, notwithstanding the provisions of subsection (b) of this section, be paid to such State or political subdivision and shall be the lesser of $300 or the actual burial and funeral expenses incurred by such State or political subdivision.

By Mr. CHILES:

S. 2049. A bill to amend title 13, United States Code, to require that the most currently produced population data obtained by the Census Bureau be used in determining benefits received by State and local governments under Federal programs; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

USE OF CURRENT CENSUS DATA IN DETERMINING STATE BENEFITS

● Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation which seeks to insure that the Census Bureau's most current population data is used by all departments and agencies in determining the benefits for State and local governments under Federal programs.

We are facing a period of reductions in Federal spending and I strongly support the work the 97th Congress has undertaken to cut back on Federal expenditures. However, during this period of recession and budget cuts, it is critical that Federal funds go where the people actually are.

My State of Florida has experienced tremendous growth during the 1970's. The State's population increased by 2.9 million people between 1970 and 1980. Nine of Florida's 67 counties more than doubled their populations during the decade. Twenty-one counties grew between 50 and 100 percent. Yet, because of Federal funding formulas, Federal assistance has not increased through the decade in proportion to the population growth. Florida is just one of many States which has experienced this problem.

Under current law, departments and agencies responsible for distribution of Federal funds are not required to use the most current population data available in their various funding formulas. Some distribution formulas only rely on decennial census information which is nearly 10 years old by the end of a decade. As a result, States like Florida, which have experienced a population boom, do not get their fair share of Federal funds.

The legislation I am introducing today would simply require all agencies and departments of the Federal Government to use most current population data available from the Census Bureau in computing how Federal funds are distributed when population is a criterion. The legislation is a companion measure to H.R. 5312, introduced by Congressman CHARLES E. BENNETT. I hope that Congress will act quickly to eliminate this inequity so that each State will receive its fair share of Federal funds.

I ask unanimous consent that this bill be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Section 183 of title 13, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

§ 183. Use of most recent population data

"For the purpose of administering any law of the United States in which population or other population characteristics are used to determine the amount of benefit received by State, county, or local units of general purpose government, the Secretary shall transmit to the President for use by the appropriate departments and agencies of the executive branch the data most recently produced and published under the title."●

S. 2051. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to deny the deduction for amounts paid or incurred for certain advertisements carried by certain broadcast undertakings; to the Committee on Finance.

DENIAL OF DEDUCTION FOR CERTAIN ADVERTISING

● Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, today I am joined by a number of my distinguished colleagues in introducing legislation that seeks to redress an unfair Canadian trade practice. This bill is the product of 2 Presidential recommendations in response to a complaint filed by 15 U.S. broadcasters pursuant to section 301 of the Trade Act of 1974.

At issue is a Canadian practice that seeks to discriminate against American border television and radio stations through the denial of a tax deduction to Canadian advertisers who wish to use their services. Efforts in recent years to persuade the Canadian Government to modify or repeal the law have failed. By one estimate, the Canadian practice is costing United States broadcasters $20 million annually in lost revenues.

Viewed in trade policy terms, the border broadcasting case is simple: A restrictive foreign trade practice has impacted adversely on the export of a U.S. service. That foreign trade practice is a clear distortion of the principle of free trade. Imposition of an offsetting barrier for the purpose of convincing the Canadians to eliminate their restrictive trade practice is now appropriate.

In the face of our declining balance of trade, it is crucial that Congress stand behind American export interests. The communications industry is one of our important service industries and the service sector is becoming an increasingly important growth area on our export ledger. Thus, it is vitally important that we reenforce one of the few legal mechanisms which U.S. service exporters can invoke to gain relief from foreign trade barriers.

The border broadcast case, as the first section 301 service sector case to proceed to a Presidential recommendation of a reciprocal response, has assumed symbolic importance for our service industry exporters. Moreover, failure to vigorously implement the finding in this case would threaten to undermine the viability of section 301.

Mr. President, I look forward to pursuing this case with a view to achieving an equitable resolution of an inequitable Canadian trade practice. In this regard, it may be necessary to review the recommended remedy at a later date to insure that it is strong enough to persuade Canada that Congress intends to support fully our export industries in the face of discriminatory foreign trade practices.

I am pleased to note that similar legislation (H.R. 5205) has been introduced in the House of Representatives by Representative CONABLE and others.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the Presidential message on the Canadian border broadcasting case be included in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the message was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

On September 9, 1980, President Carter sent a message to the Congress concerning the Canadian tax law which denies a deduction for Canadian income tax purposes for the cost of advertising placed with a foreign broadcast undertaking and directed primarily at the Canadian market. President Carter determined that this provision within Canadian law is an unreasonable practice which burdens U.S. commerce within the meaning of section 301(a)(2)(B) of the Trade Act of 1974, as amended (19 U.S.C. 2411(a)(2)(B)). President Carter further determined that the Canadian practice resulted in the loss of access by U.S broadcasters to more than $20 million in advertising revenues annually.

President Carter, under provisions of the Trade Act of 1974, proposed legislation which would amend the Internal Revenue Code to deny a deduction, otherwise allowable under the Code, for expenses of an advertisement placed with a foreign broadcast undertaking and directed primarily to a market in the United States. This restriction would apply only if a similar deduction is denied to advertisers in the country in which such station is located for the cost of advertising directed primarily to a market in that country when placed with a U.S. broadcast undertaking. It would, therefore, be applicable to Canada.

Section 301 of the Trade Act of 1974 requires that if the President determines that action by the United States is appropriate to respond to any act, policy, or practice of a foreign country that is unjustifiable, unreasonable or discriminatory and burdens or restricts United States commerce, he shall take all appropriate and feasible action within his power to obtain the elimination of such act, policy or practice. The intent of section 301 is to resolve disputes and thereby eliminate the unjustifiable, unreasonable or discriminatory trade practices which burden or restrict United States commerce. The Canadian tax law is the subject of one such dispute. Notwithstanding a good faith effort on the part of the United States Trade Representative to resolve the dispute and have the offending practice eliminated, this dispute has not been resolved. Therefore, I am acting under the authority of section 301 to recommend legislation similar to the amendment proposed by President Carter. This amendment to the Internal Revenue Code would mirror the Canadian law as it applies to broadcast undertakings, i.e., it would deny a tax deduction for expenses of advertisements placed with foreign broadcast undertaking and directed primarily to a market in the U.S. This restriction would apply only if the laws of the country in which such foreign broadcast undertaking is located deny a similar deduction to advertisers in that country. Thus, the legislation will establish a disincentive to the transfer of U.S. advertising revenues to foreign broadcast undertakings only if the laws of the country in which such broadcast undertakings are located create a similar disincentive vis-a-vis U.S. broadcast undertakings. Thus, if Canada should repeal its law, the amendment will cease to apply to Canada. It would be effective with respect to deductions attributable to transactions entered into on or after the date of introduction of this bill.

At this time, the mirror image legislation is an appropriate response to the Canadian practice. The intent of such legislation is not to erect new barriers to trade, but rather to encourage the Canadians to eliminate their unreasonable and restrictive practice. I recognize, however, that this amendment by itself may not cause the Canadians to resolve this dispute. Therefore, I note that I retain the right to take further action, if appropriate, to obtain the elimination of the practice on my own motion under the authority of section 301(c)(1). Hopefully, this will not be necessary.

This legislative proposal is being submitted at this time because I believe it is imperative that the Government of Canada be made to realize the importance the U.S. Government attaches to the resolution of this issue. I urge its early passage.

RONALD REAGAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE, November 17, 1981.●

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, it is with some measure of frustration that I ask my colleagues again to direct their attention toward the so-called "border broadcast war" between the United States and Canada. Despite the longstanding concern of this body for Canadian tax practices that unfairly penalize American broadcasters, these practices persist.

Let me be clear. This dispute was initiated by Canada. It has disrupted our bilateral relations for most of the past decade. And it threatens to undermine the unique relationship between our two countries. The Canadian Government has intentionally discriminated against American broadcasting stations whose television and radio shows are enjoyed by Canadian audiences. I will briefly explain the background to the broadcast war so that my colleagues may fully appreciate the serious nature of the dispute.

Canada and the United States have a long history of close, mutually beneficial cooperation on a wide range of matters. This cooperation has extended to the establishment and development of mutually beneficial broadcasting services along the border. There are several specific diplomatic agreements allocating television channel assignments. Both governments approved the placement of several Canadian and U.S. television stations whose signals could cross the border in either direction and provide very satisfactory viewing in major metropolitan areas of the other country. For example, WKBW-TV, WIVB-TV, and WGR-TV in Buffalo, WPTZ-TV in Plattsburgh, and WWNY-TV in Watertown are television stations which serve the residents of my own State. They have substantial Canadian viewing audiences. Several Canadian radio and television stations, in particular radio station CKLW in Windsor, Ontario, which serves the Detroit metropolitan market and derives over 90 percent of its revenues from U.S. advertising sales, reach substantial American audiences. All-in-all, there are more than 60 major American television stations which are also received in Canada, and 19 major Canadian television stations which are viewed in the United States.

As a result of this long and harmonious cooperation, Canadian citizens have enjoyed high quality, relatively inexpensive American broadcast programing. This is because the U.S. broadcasting industry developed much faster than its Canadian counterpart since the size of the American population justified greater financial investment by program sponsors in U.S. stations. Canadian viewers and Canadian industry benefited greatly from the rapid development of American broadcasting. Canadian viewers received quality U.S. programing at no direct cost. And as Canadians grew increasingly fond of watching American broadcast programs, the Canadian cable television industry developed rapidly to spread U.S. signals throughout Canada.

Today Canada has the most extensive cable television system in the world. The Canadian noncable broadcast industry has also benefited from U.S. program development. It buys the Canadian distribution rights to U.S. programs at a small fraction of the cost of those programs. A Canadian magazine reported that:

> The facts of life are these: All the popular U.S. (television) imports make money for the two Canadian networks; all major Canadian produced shows are heavy money losers.

On the U.S. side, the border broadcast stations received no tangible benefits for the service Canadians were enjoying until Canadian advertisers recognized the popularity of American programing with Canadian audiences. Then they began purchasing advertising time on U.S. stations in order to reach Canadian audiences. The total dollar flow was small compared to the overall Canadian and United States television industry revenue base, but it became significant to the U.S. border stations, facilitating the provision of quality service to their American and Canadian audiences.

This is the background of this mutually beneficial arrangement which brings the most popular and sophisticated television and radio fare to citizens all across Canada. Despite this, Canadian governmental officials believe that Canadians should be weaned away from American television. This notion has been spurred in part by a nationalistic fear of cultural absorption by the United States, and, in part, by attention to the economic interests of Canadian broadcasters who view themselves as being unable to compete effectively with American programing in the open market.

These concerns led to the enactment of bill C-58 by the Canadian Government in 1976. This bill essentially denies a business tax deduction for the cost of advertising placed with U.S. broadcasting stations.

I can understand Canadian concerns over maintaining a cultural identity separate from their larger neighbor to the south. But we are still neighbors. And the Canadian public overwhelmingly demands access to U.S. programing.

Without question bill C-58 unfairly and unreasonably penalizes U.S. broadcasters. The United States has done nothing to merit such discriminatory treatment. American broadcasters have nonetheless made repeated efforts to support the Canadians desire to develop their own program production industry. They have proposed a series of compromises to bill C-58, including a proposal to contribute a portion of Canadian revenues to a Canadian program production fund. But to no avail. The Canadian Government has simply refused to negotiate.

The fact remains that this unfair practice flagrantly violates our international trade laws. Congress has given the President explicit authority under section 301 of the 1974 Trade Act to take "all appropriate and feasible action within his power" to obtain the elimination of "unjustifiable, unreasonable, or discriminatory" foreign trade practices that burden or restrict U.S. export commerce.

Fifteen affected U.S. border broadcasting stations filed a section 301 complaint in 1978 regarding bill C-58. I remind this body that a 301 petition is one of the few legal mechanisms which U.S. industries can invoke to gain relief from restrictive foreign trade barriers. It was not until July 31, 1980, that President Carter announced that Canada had acted unreasonably. In September of that same year, he called for the enactment of mirror image legislation, but the 96th Congress did not have time to consider the proposal.

A year ago, the Reagan administration began a new review of the Canadian broadcast war. For a very long time, we awaited action by the White House, and in July, we wrote the President expressing our concern over allowing this unfair practice to persist without redress. On November 17, 1981, President Reagan sent a strong message to Congress recommending the passage of mirror image legislation. In his message, he clearly stated that "the intent of such legislation is not to erect new barriers to trade, but rather to encourage the Canadians to eliminate their unreasonable and restrictive practice."

I am joining today with several of my colleagues to introduce this mirror legislation. Our bill would amend the Internal Revenue Code to deny a tax deduction for expenses of advertisements placed with a foreign broadcast undertaking and directed primarily to a market in the United States. This restriction would apply only if the laws of the country in which such foreign broadcast undertaking is located, deny a similar deduction to advertisers in that country. In effect, if Canada should repeal its discriminatory law, our legislation would no longer apply to them.

Ours is a modest response to such a pernicious practice. The President has indicated that this legislation may not be enough to persuade the Canadians to repeal bill C-58, and therefore, has reserved the right to take further action. I would hope, however, that our neighbors to the north understand that this President and this Congress are united in their commitment to uphold our trade laws and to take the actions that are necessary to end this dispute once and for all. I do hope that Canada will respond in the vein of mutual cooperation and reciprocity that has for so long characterized our trade relationship.●

● Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, I am pleased to cosponsored the legislation introduced today by Senator DANFORTH to alleviate the discriminatory treatment experienced by broadcasters throughout the country who are located near the Canadian border.

On November 17, 1981, I had the opportunity to chair hearings on the impact of Canadian competition on small border industries. Witnesses representing the potato industry, wood products, fishing, and maple sirup producers testified about the frustration they have experienced in trying to compete with subsidized Canadian industries. Small industries are at a great disadvantage in petitioning for relief under our domestic trade laws, finding the remedies costly, complex, and ultimately beyond reach.

Now I am concerned about another consequence of Canada's aggressive development policy. In attempting to promote its own film and broadcasting industry, Canada does not allow tax deductions for advertising placed with U.S. television and radio stations by Canadian businesses to reach a Canadian market. This policy has resulted in $20 million in lost sales annually for the U.S. border stations. The industry filed a petition under section 301 of the Trade Act of 1974 which authorizes the President to obtain the elimination of unjustifiable, unreasonable, or discriminatory foreign trade practices that burden or restrict U.S. commerce.

Once again, the frustration of a small industry seeking relief under our trade laws is illustrated in a letter I received from a station in Bangor, Maine:

> The broadcasters patiently relied on a process made available by the Congress through the 1974 Trade Act, prevailed on the merits, and then in frustration watched as the present administration was unable to recommend an appropriate legislative remedy until November 17 when President Reagan issued a message to Congress on this issue.

Certainly, all of us are concerned about maintaining a close ralationship with our neighbor, Canada. Maine in particular is surrounded on three sides by Canadian territory. I must, however, express my disappointment that the Canadian Government has not been more responsive in reaching a compromise on this matter. This leaves our Government no choice but to followup with retaliatory action as called for under the bill being introduced today. This is why the legislation has been designed to mirror the discriminatory treatment of the Canadian tax law. Reciprocity is the fundamental principle underlying our international trading system, and Canada must realize that discriminatory trade policies will not be tolerated.

The modern world has provided a communications industry that can transmit information with unprecedented speed to all parts of our globe. With that technological advance come accompanying tensions about proper control of information. Part of the Canadian broadcast policy stems from a reluctance to have U.S. programing dominate Canadian culture. Governments will have to learn to deal with these kinds of tensions more and more in our increasingly interdependent world.

I congratulate the administration for its concern in this area and for a willingness to provide relief to the affected industries. Fair trade in services has become a priority for this country in international trading relationships, and this is an important test case in this area. I look forward to a continued dialog with the administration to seek appropriate remedies for other industries who have been adversely affected by Canadian competition.●

By Mr. DECONCINI:

S. 2053. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to increase and make permanent the exclusion from gross income of interest on all-savers certificates; to the Committee on Finance.

EXTENSION OF ALL-SAVERS ACT

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation to extend the All-Savers Act passed last year as part of the tax bill. My bill will lift the present December 31, 1982 deadline for all-savers certificates and will increase the interest exemption to $2,000 yearly for an individual ($4,000 for a couple filing jointly).

All-savers certificates attracted almost $35 billion nationwide in their first month of availability. In my home State of Arizona, 12 savings and loan associations reported statewide that more than 35,000 accounts totaling over $240 million in the last quarter of 1981 were opened.

All-savers certificates have two basic goals. The first is to encourage savings, and the second is to boost the homebuilding industry in this country. The first goal of encouraging savings has been met by the $35 billion in new accounts.

More importantly, these accounts are giving small savers access to high interest rates in federally insured accounts. The U.S. League of Savings Associations estimates that 40 percent of the accounts were opened by households earning less than $30,000 annually.

Many thrift institutions open all-savers accounts for amounts as low as $100 and with the same rate of return as a $10,000 all-savers account.

Certainly, there is no question that the homebuilding industry is in a deep depression, indeed, a depression of historic proportions. In December of 1979 housing starts nationwide were at an annual rate of 1.6 million. In December of 1981 that figure had dropped to only 980,000—a decrease of almost 40 percent.

Arizona, the second fastest growing State in the Nation, has been even harder hit. According to the Southern Arizona Home Builders, housing starts have dropped from 7,238 in 1979 to 2,454 in 1981.

Obviously, we cannot continue to allow this industry to suffer. At the same time, I do not believe in direct Federal subsidies to bail out the private sector. An extension of the all-savers is a much better approach to the problem.

High interest rates continue to plague our economy, and the all-saver certificate will not solve the many problems this creates. We must reduce Government spending and decrease the Federal deficit if we are going to see a permanent reduction in interest rates. However, the all-saver certificate will at least put more money at the disposal of mortgage lending, thus enabling the American consumer to purchase a home.

I urge my colleagues to join me in cosponsoring this legislation which will continue to give the small savers a safe place to earn high interest rates while benefiting the economy as a whole.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2053

(4) Subsection (b) of section 854 is amended to read as follows:

"(b) OTHER DIVIDENDS AND TAXABLE INTEREST.—

"(1) DEDUCTION UNDER SECTION 243.—In the case of a dividend received from a regulated investment company (other than a dividend to which subsection (a) applies)—

"(A) if such investment company meets the requirements of section 852(a) for the taxable year during which it paid such dividend; and

"(B) the aggregate dividends received by such company during such taxable year are less than 75 percent of its gross income.

then, in computing the deduction under section 243, there shall be taken into account only that portion of the dividend which bears the same ratio to the amount of such dividend as the aggregate dividends received by such company during such taxable year bear to its gross income for such taxable year.

"(2) EXCLUSION UNDER SECTIONS 116 AND 130.—For purposes of sections 116 and 130, in the case of any dividend (other than a dividend described in subsection (a)) received from a regulated investment company which meets the requirements of section 852 for the taxable year in which it paid the dividend—

"(A) the entire amount of such dividend shall be treated as a dividend if the aggregate dividends received by such company during the taxable year equal or exceed 75 percent of its gross income,

"(B) the entire amount of such dividend shall be treated as interest if the aggregate interest received by such company during the taxable year equals or exceeds 75 percent of its gross income, or

"(C) if subparagraphs (A) and (B) do not apply, a portion of such dividend shall be treated as a dividend (and a portion of such dividend shall be treated as interest) based on the portion of the company's gross income which consists of aggregate dividends or aggregate interests, as the case may be. For purposes of the preceding sentence, gross income and aggregate interest received shall each be reduced by so much of the deduction allowable by section 163 for the taxable year as does not exceed aggregate interest received for the taxable year.

SUBCOMMITTEE ON LABOR, HEALTH, AND HUMAN SERVICES, EDUCATION AND RELATED AGENCIES

Mr. SCHMITT. Mr. President, I am pleased to advise the Senate that my Appropriations Subcommittee on Labor, Health and Human Services, Education and Related Agencies will begin its fiscal 1983 hearings on Wednesday, February 3, at 1:30 p.m. with an oversight hearing on a number of newly authorized programs. The subcommittee has a very large area of jurisdiction and its hearings are customarily extensive. As presently scheduled, they will run through the early part of May.

A popular feature of our hearings involves the taking of testimony from individuals and organizations from the private sector. We always receive many such requests to testify before the subcommittee and it is important to the various groups involved to know well in advance as to when our "outside witness" hearings will be held.

I, therefore, am glad to announce today that as presently scheduled, the subcommittee will hold outside witness hearings beginning Monday, May 3, at 2 p.m. and extending through Friday, May 7.

I also wish to announce that the deadline for interested groups and individuals to submit their requests for an opportunity to testify will be Friday, March 12. All requests should be in writing and such communications may be addressed to me in care of the Labor, Health and Human Services, Education and Related Agencies Appropriations Subcommittee, 1108 Dirksen Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C. 20510.

Those writing in will receive a letter providing instructions for their appearance before the subcommittee.

In addition, the deadline for those who only wish to submit statements for the hearing record will be Friday, May 7. Such statements should be no longer than seven double-spaced pages and should also be sent to me in care of the subcommittee office.

SUBCOMMITTEE ON TAXATION AND DEBT MANAGEMENT

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, the Subcommittee on Taxation and Debt Management of the Senate Finance Committee and the Subcommittee on Housing and Urban Affairs chaired by Senator RICHARD LUGAR, of the Senate Committee on Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs will hold a joint hearing at 9 a.m. on February 5, 1982. One bill has been scheduled: S. 1828, introduced by Senator LUGAR relating to the tax treatment of partnerships between thrift institutions and others.

The purpose of this notice is to briefly explain the issue raised by this bill. This may help in charting the progress of tax legislation before the Taxation Subcommittee, and to assure greater public awareness of tax bills coming up for hearings.

THRIFT PARTNERSHIP TAX ACT OF 1981—S. 1828

S. 1828 would provide for special tax treatment of partnerships between thrift institutions and others. The partnerships would be used to help thrifts to dispose of low-yield mortgages by passing the loss on disposition to other taxpayer partners who can use the losses to offset income. Specifically, S. 1828 would provide that; first, the character of gain or loss on the sale of mortgages by the partnership would be determined as if the mortgages were sold by the thrift institution, second, a partner's distributive share of gain or loss from the sale of mortgages may be determined without regard to whether the allocation has substantial economic effect, third, a contribution of mortgages to a partnership, would still be treated as a contribution of the mortgages themselves and not the proceeds of their sale, and fourth, the character of the assets of the partnership will flow through proportionately to the thrift institution for determining whether it qualifies as a domestic building and loan association.

SUBCOMMITTEE ON ENERGY AND MINERAL RESOURCES

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I would like to announce for the information of the Senate and the public the scheduling of oversight hearings before the Subcommittee on Energy and Mineral Resources. The hearings will be held on Monday, February 8 and Friday, February 26, beginning at 10 a.m. in room 3110 of the Dirksen Senate Office Building to review the capacity, distribution and status of the Nation's strategic petroleum reserve.

Those wishing to testify or who wish to submit written statements for the hearing record should write to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, Subcommittee on Energy and Mineral Resources, room 3104, Dirksen Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C. 20510.

For further information regarding these hearings you may wish to contact Mr. Roger Sindelar of the subcommittee staff at 224-4236.

COMMITTEE ON ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES

(See Rule 9 on Procedures for Handling Committee Sensitive and Classified Materials.)

If either the Chairman or the Vice Chairman concludes from the report that it appears that the member may be ineligible, the member shall be notified in writing of the nature of the particular proceeding and the reason that it appears that the member may be ineligible to participate in it. If the member agrees that he or she is ineligible, the member shall so notify the Chairman or Vice Chairman. If the member believes that he or she is not ineligible, he or she may explain the reasons to the Chairman and Vice Chairman, and if they both agree that the member is not ineligible, the member shall continue to serve. But if either the Chairman or Vice Chairman continues to believe that the member is ineligible, while the member believes that he or she is not ineligible, the matter shall be promptly referred to the Committee. The member shall present his or her arguments to the Committee in executive session. (l) Recorded Votes: Any member may require a recorded vote on any matter.

(m) Proxies; Recording Votes of Absent Members:

(1) Proxy voting shall not be allowed when the question before the Committee is the initiation or continuation of an initial review or an investigation, or the issuance of a report or recommendation related thereto concerning a Member or officer of the Senate. In any such case an absent member's vote may be announced solely for the purpose of recording the member's position and such announced votes shall not be counted for or against the motion.

(2) On matters other than matters listed in paragraph (m) (1) above, the Committee may order that the record be held open for the vote of absentees or recorded proxy votes if the absent Committee member has been informed of the matter on which the vote occurs and has affirmatively requested of the Chairman or Vice Chairman in writing that he be so recorded.

(3) All proxies shall be in writing, and shall be delivered to the Chairman or Vice Chairman to be recorded.

(4) Proxies shall not be considered for the purpose of establishing a quorum.

(n) Approval of Blind Trusts and Foreign Travel Requests Between Sessions and During Extended Recesses:

(o) Committee Use of Services or Employees of Other Agencies and Departments:

With the prior consent of the department or agency involved, the Committee may (1) utilize the services, information, or facilities of any such department or agency of the Government, and (2) employ on a reimbursable basis or otherwise the services of such personnel of any such department or agency as it deems advisable. With the consent of any other committee of the Senate, or any subcommittee, the Committee may utilize the facilities and the services of the staff of such other committee or subcommittee whenever the Chairman and Vice Chairman of the Committee, acting jointly, determine that such action is necessary and appropriate.

RULE 2: PROCEDURES FOR SWORN COMPLAINTS

(a) Sworn Complaints: Any person may file a sworn complaint with the Committee, alleging that any Senator, or officer, or employee of the Senate has violated a law, the Senate Code of Official Conduct, or any rule or regulation of the Senate relating to the conduct of any individual in the performance of his or her duty as a Member, officer, or employee of the Senate, or has engaged in improper conduct which may reflect upon the Senate.

(b) Form and Content of Complaints: A complaint filed under paragraph (a) shall be in writing and under oath, and shall set forth in simple, concise and direct statements:

(1) The name and legal address of the party filing the complaint (hereinafter, the complainant);

(2) The name and position or title of each Member, officer, or employee of the Senate who is specifically alleged to have engaged in the improper conduct or committed the violation (hereinafter, the respondent);

(3) The nature of the alleged improper conduct or violation, including if possible, the specific provision of the Senate Code of Official Conduct or other law, rule, or regulation alleged to have been violated.

(4)(A) A statement of the facts within the personal knowledge of the complainant that are alleged to constitute the improper conduct or violation.

(B) The term "personal knowledge" is not intended to and does not limit the complainant's statement to situations that he or she personally witnessed or to activities in which the complainant was a participant.

(C) Where allegations in the sworn complaint are made upon the information and belief of the complainant, the complaint shall so state, and shall set forth the basis for such information and belief.

(5) The complainant must swear that all of the information contained in the complaint either (a) is true, or (b) was obtained under circumstances such that the complainant has sufficient personal knowledge of the source of the information reasonably to believe that it is true. The complainant may so swear either by oath or by solemn affirmation before a notary public or other authorized official.

(6) All documents in the possession of the complainant relevant to or in support of his or her allegations may be appended to the complaint.

(c) Processing of Sworn Complaints:

(1) When the Committee receives a sworn complaint against a Member, officer or employee of the Senate, it shall determine by majority vote whether the complaint is in substantial compliance with paragraph (b) of this rule.

(2) If it is determined by the Committee that a sworn complaint does not substantially comply with the requirements of paragraph (b), the complaint shall be returned promptly to the complainant, with a statement explaining how the complaint fails to comply and a copy of the rules for filing sworn complaints. The complainant may resubmit the complaint in the proper form. If the complaint is not revised so that it substantially complies with the stated requirements, the Committee may in its discretion process the complaint in accordance with Rule 3.

(3) A sworn complaint against any Member, officer, or employee of the Senate that is determined by the Committee to be in substantial compliance shall be transmitted to the respondent within five days of that determination. The transmittal notice shall include the date upon which the complaint was received, a statement that the complaint conforms to the applicable rules, a statement that the Committee will immediately begin an initial review of the complaint, and a statement inviting the respondent to provide any information relevant to the complaint to the Committee. A copy of the Rules of the Committee shall be supplied with the notice.

RULE 3: PROCEDURES ON RECEIPT OF ALLEGATIONS OTHER THAN A SWORN COMPLAINT; PRELIMINARY INQUIRY

(a) Unsworn Allegations or Information: Any member or staff member of the Committee shall report to the Committee, and any other person may report to the Committee, any credible information available to him or her that indicates that any named or unnamed Member, officer or employee of the Senate may have—

(1) violated the Senate Code of Official Conduct;

(2) violated a law;

(3) violated any rule or regulation of the Senate relating to the conduct of individuals in the performance of their duties as Members, officers, or employees of the Senate; or

(4) engaged in improper conduct which may reflect upon the Senate. Such allegations or information may be reported to the Chairman, the Vice Chairman, a Committee member, or a Committee staff member.

(b) Sources of Unsworn Allegations or Information: The information to be reported to the Committee under paragraph (a), may be obtained from a variety of sources, including but not limited to the following:

(1) sworn complaints that do not satisfy all of the requirements of Rule 2:

(2) anonymous or informal complaints, whether or not satisfying the requirments of Rule 2;

(3) information developed during a study or inquiry by the Committee or other committees or subcommittees of the Senate, including information obtained in connection with legislative or general oversight hearings;

(4) information reported by the news media; or

(5) information obtained from any individual, agency or department of the executive branch of the Federal Government.

(c) Preliminary Inquiry:

(1) When information is presented to the Committee pursuant to paragraph (a), it shall immediately be transmitted to the Chairman and the Vice Chairman, for one of the following actions.

(A) The Chairman and Vice Chairman, acting jointly, may conduct or may direct the Committee staff to conduct, a preliminary inquiry.

(B) The Chairman and Vice Chairman, acting jointly, may present the allegations or information received directly to the Committee for it to determine whether an initial review should be undertaken (See paragraph (d).)

(2) A preliminary inquiry may include any inquiries or interviews that the Chairman and the Vice Chairman deem necessary or appropriate. In particular, the preliminary inquiry may seek independent credible evidence that tends to corroborate the information received and may also include discussions or correspondence with the complainant, if any, and the respondent, if any.

(3) At the conclusion of a preliminary inquiry, the Chairman and Vice Chairman shall receive a full report of its findings. The Chairman and Vice Chairman, acting jointly, shall then determine what further action, if any, is appropriate in the particular case, including any of the following:

(A) No further action is appropriate, because the alleged improper conduct or violation is clearly not within the jurisdiction of the Committee;

(B) No further action is appropriate, because there is no reason to believe that the alleged improper conduct or violation may have occurred; or

(C) The unsworn allegations or information, and a report on the preliminary inquiry, should be referred to the Committee, to determine whether an initial review should be undertaken. (See paragraph (d).)

(4) If the Chairman and the Vice Chairman are unable to agree on a determination at the conclusion of a preliminary inquiry, then they shall refer the allegations or information to the Committee, with a report on the preliminary inquiry, for the Committee to determine whether an initial review should be undertaken. (See paragraph (d).)

(5) A preliminary inquiry shall be completed within sixty days after the unsworn allegations or information were received by the Chairman and Vice Chairman. The sixty day period may be extended for a specified period by the Chairman and Vice Chairman, acting jointly. A preliminary inquiry is completed when the Chairman and the Vice Chairman have made the determination required by subparagraphs (3) and (4) of this paragraph.

(d) Determination Whether to Conduct an Initial Review: When information or allegations are presented to the Committee by the Chairman and the Vice Chairman, the Committee shall determine whether an initial review should be undertaken.

(1) An initial review shall be undertaken when—

(A) there is reason to believe on the basis of the information before the Committee that the possible improper conduct or violation may be within the jurisdiction of the Committee; and

(B) there is reason to believe on the basis of the information before the Committee that the improper conduct or violation may have occurred.

(2) The determination whether to undertake an initial review shall be made by recorded vote within thirty days following the Committee's receipt of the unsworn allegations or information from the Chairman or Vice Chairman, or at the first meeting of the Committee thereafter if none occurs within thirty days, unless this time is extended for a specified period by the Committee.

(3) The Committee may determine that an initial review is not warranted because (a) there is no reason to believe on the basis of the information before the Committee that the improper conduct or violation may have occurred, or (b) the improper conduct or violation, even if proven, is not within the jurisdiction of the Committee.

(A) If the Committee determines that an initial review is not warranted, it shall promptly notify the complainant, if any, and any known respondent.

(B) If there is a complainant, he or she may also be invited to submit additional information, and notified of the procedures for filing a sworn complaint. If the complainant later provides additional information, not in the form of a sworn complaint, it shall be handled as a new allegation in accordance with the procedures of Rule 3. If he or she submits a sworn complaint, it shall be handled in accordance with Rule 2.

(4)(A) The Committee may determine that there is a reason to believe on the basis of the information before it that the improper conduct or violation may have occurred and may be within the jurisdiction of the Committee, and that an initial review must therefore be conducted.

(B) If the Committee determines that an initial review will be conducted, it shall promptly notify the complainant, if any, and the respondent, if any.

(C) The notice required under subparagraph (B) shall include a general statement of the information or allegations before the Committee, and a statement that the Committee will immediately begin an initial review of the complaint. A copy of the Rules of the Committee shall be supplied with the notice.

(5) If a member of the Committee believes that the preliminary inquiry has provided sufficient information for the Committee to determine whether there is substantial credible evidence which provides substantial cause for the Committee to conclude that a violation within the jurisdiction of the Committee has occurred, the member may move that the Committee dispense with the initial review and move directly to the determinations described in Rule 4(f). The Committee may adopt such a motion by majority vote of the full Committee.

RULE 4: PROCEDURES FOR CONDUCTING AN INITIAL REVIEW

(a) Basis for Initial Review: The Committee shall promptly commence an initial review whenever it has received either (1) a sworn complaint that the Committee has determined is in substantial compliance with the requirements of Rule 2, or (2) unsworn allegations or information that have caused the Committee to determine in accordance with Rule 3 that an initial review must be conducted.

(b) Scope of Initial Review:

(1) The initial review shall be of such duration and scope as may be necessary to determine whether there is substantial credible evidence which provides substantial cause for the Committee to conclude that a violation within the jurisdiction of the Committee has occurred.

(2) The initial review may include any inquiries or interviews that the Committee deems appropriate to obtain the evidence upon which to make the determination required by subparagraph (1), including the taking of sworn statements and the use of subpoenas.

(c) Opportunity of Response: An initial review may include an opportunity for any known respondent or his designated representative, to present either a written or oral statement, or to respond orally to questions from the Committee. Such an oral statement or answers shall be transmitted and signed by the person providing the statement or answers.

(d) Status Reports: The Committee staff or outside counsel shall periodically report to the Committee in the form and according to the schedule prescribed by the Committee. The reports shall be confidential.

(e) Final Report: When the initial review is completed, the staff or outside counsel shall make a confidential report to the Committee on findings and recommendations.

(f) Committee Action: As soon as practicable following submission of the report on the initial review, the Committee shall determine by a recorded vote whether there is substantial credible evidence which provides substantial cause for the Committee to conclude that violation within the jurisdiction of the Committee has occurred. The Committee may make any of the following determinations:

(1) The Committee may determine that there is not such substantial credible evidence. In this case, the Committee shall report its determination to the complainant, if any, and to the respondent, together with an explanation of the basis for the determination. The explanation may be as detailed as the Committee desires, but it is not required to include a complete discussion of the evidence collected in the initial review.

(2) The Committee may determine that there is such substantial credible evidence, but that the alleged violation is inadvertent, technical, or otherwise of a de minimis nature. In this case, the Committee may attempt to correct or to prevent such violation by informal methods. The Committee's final determination in this matter shall be reported to the complainant, if any, and to the respondent, if any.

(3) The Committee may determine that there is such substantial credible evidence, but that the alleged violation, if proven, although not of a de minimis nature, would not be sufficiently serious to justify the severe disciplinary actions specified in Senate Resolution 338, 88th Congress, as amended (i.e., for a Member, censure, expulsion, or recommendation to the appropriate party conference regarding the Member's seniority or positions of responsibility; or for an officer or employee, suspension or dismissal). In this case, the Committee, by the recorded affirmative vote of at least four members, may propose a remedy that it deems appropriate. If the respondent agrees to the proposed remedy, a summary of the Committee's conclusions and the remedy proposed and agreed to shall be filed as a public record with the Secretary of the Senate and a notice of the filing shall be printed in the Congressional Record.

(4) The Committee may determine, by recorded affirmative vote of at least four members, that there is such substantial credible evidence, and also either: (A) that the violation, if proved, would be sufficiently serious to warrant imposition of one of the severe disciplinary actions listed in paragraph (3); or (B) that the violation, if proven, is less serious, but was not resolved pursuant to the procedure in paragraph (3). In either case, the Committee shall order that an investigation promptly be conducted in accordance with Rule 5.

RULE 5: PROCEDURES FOR CONDUCTING AN INVESTIGATION

(a) Definition of Investigation: An "investigation" is a proceeding undertaken by the Committee, by recorded affirmative vote of at least four members, after a finding on the basis of an initial review that there is substantial credible evidence which provides substantial cause for the Committee to conclude that a violation within its jurisdiction has occurred.

(b) Scope of Investigation: When the Committee decides to conduct an investigation, it shall be of such duration and scope as is necessary for the Committee to determine whether a violation within its jurisdiction has occurred. In the course of the investigation, designated outside counsel, or if the Committee determines not to use outside counsel, the Committee or its staff, may conduct inquiries or interviews, take sworn statements, use compulsory process as described in Rule 7, or take any other actions that the Committee deems appropriate to secure the evidence necessary to make this determination.

(c) Notice to Respondent: The Committee shall give written notice to any known respondent who is the subject of an investigation. The notice shall be sent to the respondent no later than five working days after the Committee has voted to conduct an investigation. The notice shall include a statement of the nature of the possible violation, and a description of the evidence indicating that a possible violation occurred. The Committee shall offer the respondent an opportunity to present a statement or to respond to questions from members of the Committee, the Committee staff, or outside counsel.

(d) Right to a Hearing: The Committee shall accord a respondent an opportunity for a hearing before it recommends disciplinary action against that respondent to the Senate.

(e) Progress Reports to Committee: The Committee staff or outside counsel shall periodically report to the Committee concerning the progress of the investigation. Such reports shall be delivered to the Committee in the form and according to the schedule prescribed by the Committee, and shall be confidential.

(f) Report of Investigation:

(1) Upon completion of an investigation, including any hearings held pursuant to Rule 6, the outside counsel or the staff shall submit a confidential written report to the Committee, which shall detail the factual findings of the investigation and which may recommend disciplinary action, if appropriate. Findings of fact of the investigation shall be detailed in this report whether or not disciplinary action is recommended.

(2) The Committee shall consider the report of the staff or outside counsel promply following its submission. The Committee shall prepare and submit a report to the Senate, including a recommendation to the Senate concerning disciplinary action, if appropriate. A report shall be issued, stating in detail the Committee's findings of fact, whether or not disciplinary action is recommended. The report shall also explain fully the reasons underlying the Committee's recommendation concerning disciplinary action, if any. No recommendation or resolution of the Committee concerning the investigation of a Member, officer or employee of the Senate may be approved except by the affirmative recorded vote of not less than four members of the Committee's.

(3) Promptly after the conclusion of the investigation, the Committee's report and recommendation shall be forwarded to the Secretary of the Senate, and a copy shall be provided to the complainant and the respondent. The full report and recommendation shall be printed and made public, unless the Committee determines by majority vote that it should remain confidential.

RULE 6: PROCEDURES FOR HEARINGS

(a) Right to a Hearing: The Committee may hold a public or executive hearing in any inquiry, initial review, investigation, or other proceeding. The Committee shall accord a respondent an opportunity for a hearing before it recommends disciplinary action against that respondent to the Senate. (See Rule 5(e).)

(b) Non-public Hearings: The Committee may at any time during a hearing determine in accordance with paragraph 5(b) of Rule XXVI of the Standing Rules of the Senate whether to receive the testimony of specific witnesses in executive session. If a witness desires to express a preference for testifying in public or in executive session, he or she shall so notify the Committee at least five days before he or she is scheduled to testify.

(c) Adjudicatory Hearings: The Committee may, by majority vote, designate any public or executive hearing as an adjudicatory hearing; and, any hearing which is concerned with possible disciplinary action against a respondent or respondents designated by the Committee shall be an adjudicatory hearing. In any adjudicatory hearing, the procedures described in paragraph (j) shall apply.

(d) Subpoena Power: The Committee may require, by subpoena or otherwise, the attendance and testimony of such witnesses and the production of such correspondence, books, papers, documents or other articles as it deems advisable. (See Rule 7.)

(e) Notice of Hearings: The Committee shall make public an announcement of the date, place, and subject matter of any hearing to be conducted by it, in accordance with Rule 1(f).

(f) Presiding Officer: The Chairman shall preside over the hearings, or in his absence the Vice Chairman. If the Vice Chairman is also absent, a Committee member designated by the Chairman shall preside. If an oath or affirmation is required, it shall be administered to a witness by the Presiding Officer, or in his absence, by any Committee member.

(g) Witnesses:

(1) A subpoena or other request to testify shall be served on a witness sufficiently in advance of his or her scheduled appearance to allow the witness a reasonable period of time, as determined by the Committee, to prepare for the hearing and to employ counsel if desired.

(2) The Committee may, by majority vote, rule that no member of the Committee or staff or outside counsel shall make public the name of any witness subpoenaed by the Committee before the date of that witness' scheduled appearance, except as specifically authorized by the Chairman and Vice Chairman, acting jointly.

(3) Any witness desiring to read a prepared or written statement in executive or public hearings shall file a copy of such statement with the Committee at least two working days in advance of the hearing at which the statement is to be presented. The Chairman and Vice Chairman shall determine whether such statements may be read or placed in the record of the hearing.

(4) Insofar as practicable, each witness shall be permitted to present a brief oral opening statement, if he or she desires to do so.

(h) Right to Testify: Any person whose name is mentioned or who is specifically identified or otherwise referred to in testimony or in statements made by a Committee member, staff member or outside counsel, or any witness, and who reasonably believes that the statement tends to adversely affect his or her reputation may—

(1) request to appear personally before the Committee to testify in his or her own behalf; or

(2) file a sworn statement of facts relevant to the testimony or other evidence or statement of which he or she complained. Such request and such statement shall be submitted to the Committee for its consideration and action.

(i) Conduct of Witnesses and Other Attendees: The Presiding Officer may punish any breaches of order and decorum by censure and exclusion from the hearings. The Committee, by majority vote, may recommend to the Senate that the offender be cited for contempt of Congress.

(2) Preparation for Adjudicatory Hearings:

(A) At least five working days prior to the commencement of an adjudicatory hearing, the Committee shall provide the following information and documents to the respondent, if any:

(i) a list of proposed witnesses to be called at the hearing;

(ii) copies of all documents expected to be introduced as exhibits at the hearing; and

(iii) a brief statement as to the nature of the testimony expected to be given by each witness to be called at the hearing.

(B) At least two working days prior to the commencement of an adjudicatory hearing, the respondent, if any, shall provide the information and documents described in divisions (i), (ii) and (iii) of subparagraph (A) to the Committee.

(C) At the discretion of the Committee, the information and documents to be exchanged under this paragraph shall be subject to an appropriate agreement limiting access and disclosure.

(D) If a respondent refuses to provide the information and documents to the Committee (see (A) and (B) of this subparagraph), or if a respondent or other individual violates an agreement limiting access and disclosure, the Committee, by majority vote, may recommend to the Senate that the offender be cited for contempt of Congress.

(3) Swearing of Witnesses: All witnesses who testify at adjudicatory hearings shall be sworn unless the Presiding Officer, for good cause, decides that a witness does not have to be sworn.

(4) Right to Counsel: Any witness at an adjudicatory hearing may be accompanied by counsel of his or her own choosing, who shall be permitted to advise the witness of his or her legal rights during the testimony.

(5) Right to Cross-Examine and Call Witnesses:

(C) With respect to witnesses called by a respondent, or other individual given permission by the Committee, each such witness shall first be examined by the party who called the witness or by that party's counsel.

(D) At least one working day before a witness' scheduled appearance, a witness or a witness' counsel may submit to the Committee written questions proposed to be asked of that witness. If the Committee determines that it is necessary, such questions may be asked by any member of the Committee, or by any Committee staff member if directed by a Committee member. The witness or witness' counsel may also submit additional sworn testimony for the record within twenty four hours after the last day that the witness has testified. The insertion of such testimony in that day's record is subject to the approval of the Chairman and Vice Chairman acting jointly within five days after the testimony is received.

(6) Admissibility of Evidence:

(A) The object of the hearing shall be to ascertain the truth. Any evidence that may be relevant and probative shall be admissible, unless privileged under the Federal Rules of Evidence. Rules of evidence shall not be applied strictly, but the Presiding Officer shall exclude irrelevant or unduly repetitious testimony. Objections going only to the weight that should be given evidence will not justify its exclusion.

(B) The Presiding Officer shall rule upon any question of the admissibility of testimony or other evidence presented to the Committee. Such rulings shall be final unless reversed or modified by a majority vote of the Committee before the recess of that day's hearings.

(7) Supplementary Hearing Procedures: The Committee may adopt any additional special hearing procedures that it deems necessary or appropriate to a particular adjudicatory hearing. (2) Except for the record of a hearing which is closed to the public, each transcript shall be printed as soon as is practicable after receipt of the corrected version., The Chairman and Vice Chairman, acting jointly, may order the transcript of a hearing to be printed without the corrections of a member or witness if they determine that such member or witness has been afforded a reasonable time to correct such transcript and such transcript has not been returned within such time.

(3) The Committee shall furnish each witness, at no cost, one transcript copy of that witness' testimony given at a public hearing. If the testimony was given in executive session, then a transcript copy shall be provided upon request, subject to appropriate conditions and restrictions prescribed by the Chairman and Vice Chairman. VOTING RIGHTS ACT

● Mr. SCHMITT. Mr. President. I take pride in joining my colleagues as a co-sponsor of S. 1992, the House passed version of the bill which would extend the Voting Rights Act. The bill reaffirms this Nation's strong commitment to preserve the most fundamental of our constitutionally guaranteed rights—the right to vote. Since 1975, each of New Mexico's 32 counties has been subject to the bilingual election provisions of the Voting Rights Act. Requiring bilingual elections has not imposed a burden on the State. To the contrary, New Mexico has had bilingual elections for State officials since 1912. Due to this legacy of encouraging all of its residents to vote, New Mexico now has the highest degree of Hispanic voter participation in the Nation and the greatest number of elected Hispanic officials. I am proud of this achievement.

Nevertheless, the successes of the past could quickly disappear if section 4 of S. 1992 is not clarified or omitted. Section 4 provides that "Nothing in this Act shall be construed in such a way as to permit voting assistance to be given within the voting booth, unless the voter is blind or physically incapacitated.". This section was agreed to by the House by voice vote after little debate and no public comment. Although the purpose of the section is to prevent voter fraud, I believe that the section is unnecessary and could effectively disenfranchise many Hispanics and Indians who cannot read English or their native language. For example, six New Mexico counties provide oral translations in various Indian dialects on election day because the languages are traditionally unwritten or impossible to translate literally into English. As written, section 4 would prohibit this kind of oral assistance thereby denying individuals the opportunity to cast their vote intelligently.

Whatever voter fraud occurs through oral assistance in the voting booth can easily be thwarted through vigorous enforcement of criminal fraud statutes already in existence. Under the Constitution, the States have the authority to enforce the time, place, and manner of Federal elections. This has been interpreted as including the authority to provide protections for voter fraud. A criminal statute prohibiting voter fraud exists in every State. This is not the time for the Congress to usurp the longstanding authority of the States in this area. Mr. President, I have asked the Judiciary Committee to closely examine this section so that oral voting assistance under given circumstances can be continued.●

OIL AND GAS ROYALTY RIP-OFF

● Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, on Thursday, January 28, 1982, I took part in a hearing before the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee in which it was reported that the U.S. Treasury, mineral-producing States, and Indian tribes are losing hundreds of millions of dollars in oil and gas royalties each year. We are all committed to eliminating waste, fraud, and abuse in both the Federal Government and the private sector, and I would like to take just a minute to share the committee's findings with my colleagues and to particularly commend the efforts of Senators WALLOP, MELCHER, and MCCLURE in this regard.

The hearing centered around the Commission on Fiscal Accountability of the Nation's Resources, which has just completed a 6-month investigation of inspection and royalty collection practices on Federal lands. Appointed this past summer by Secretary of Interior Watt, the Commission has uncovered and brought a much-needed focus to the growing problems of accounting mismanagement, oil theft, and the inadequacy of enforcement capabilities at the local, State and Federal level.

To be sure, we are not talking about a nickel and dime problem. The Federal royalty collection program now provides approximately $5 billion a year for the U.S. Treasury, States, and Indian tribes. It is estimated that an additional 7 to 10 percent of this—as much as $500 million a year—goes unreported to the Government. As Federal leasing and mineral resources development increases in the future, this abuse of the royalty collection system could result in losses of up to $10 billion by the end of the decade.

Mr. President, we have heard political charges recently about how this administration, and the Secretary of Interior in particular, is soft on the big oil companies. Be this as it may, I would like to point out that this administration is taking major steps towards cracking down on a system which has been sorely mismanaged for more than 20 years. Based on the Commission's recommendations, Secretary Watt has announced a major overhaul of the Interior Department's royalty collection system. He has created a new Minerals Management Service within the Department, and he has announced the creation of a Legislative Task Force which will develop an omnibus royalty management bill in cooperation with Congress.

Among these proposed legislative changes are stiffer criminal penalties for security and reporting violations, a plan to make States and Indian tribes equal partners in the collection program, and raising the onshore minimum royalty rate from its present 12½ percent to 16⅔ percent. I support these changes, and as a member of the Energy and Natural Resources Committee, I will do all that I can to see that these recommendations become law as soon as possible.

Regardless of which political party is in office, it is imperative that the Federal Government act as a responsible trustee for our public lands. An important part of this job is to insure a just rate of return to the public for mineral development on Federal lands and, without pointing the finger at anyone in particular, I hope that the individuals and companies who are responsible for this defrauding of the American public will realize that they, too, must share in this responsibility. Twenty-five oil companies are responsible for roughly 85 percent of all royalties collected, and it is safe to say that internal improvements within the industry's accounting—and accountability—systems will be needed as well.

Finally, Mr. President, I want to emphasize that if Congress is serious about tightening its belt and improving Government efficiency, we should pursue these lost royalties, as well as other debts outstanding, before we simply turn to the taxpayers to bail us out of the present budgetary crunch. This is only the tip of the iceberg, and we owe it to the American people to recover from the few who break the law what rightfully belongs to the Nation.●

UNITED STATES POPULATION

● Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I wish to report that according to the latest U.S. Census Bureau approximations, the total population of the United States on February 1, 1982, was 230,634,094. This represents an increase of 121,776 since January 1, 1982. Since this time last year, our population has grown by an additional 2,152,661.

In one short month we have added enough people to our population to fill the city of West Palm Beach, Fla., more than three times. Over the past year, our population has increased enough to almost fill the entire city of Los Angeles, Calif.●

CLIFTON E. FRENCH

● Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, yesterday marked a significant milestone in the life of a great individual and personal friend from Minnesota. Clifton E. French completed 20 years as superintendent and secretary to the Hennepin County Park Reserve District. Clif was hired as the park reserve district's first professional employee. His professional career is as illustrative as the park reserve district's story of a multicounty park system in the Twin Cities metropolitan area.

I had the pleasure and honor of serving with Clif during my term as chairman of the Hennepin County Park Reserve District. That was in the midseventies. We were putting into practical terms the principles of new federalism at a time when federalism really was new.

The Hennepin County Park Reserve District was redefining federalism, strengthening private sector initiative and learning to do more with less. In fact, I can't think of a better disciple of any of these causes than Clif French. For years he has fought those who think that the solution to any problem is carrying the bag to and from Washington's grant programs.

Clif helped build a system founded on contributed land, dollars and services, mixing those private initiatives with appropriate resources from the Federal, State, and local governments.

He was instrumental in guiding a fledgling county park system in 1962 of 1,400 acres to a nationally recognized multicounty park system. Today, just 20 years later, the park reserve district operates and maintains over 24,000 acres of park reserves, regional parks, and trail corridors in six Twin Cities area counties. Clif's professional talents have played a major role in creating a large, diverse, and outstanding system of county and regional parks.

Clif's career in parks and recreation began when he received a bachelor's degree in recreation leadership at the University of Minnesota in 1948. A year later he earned a master's in recreation leadership at the same university. In 1953, while working as an instructor in recreation and physical education at the University of Missouri, he finished course work on a doctorate in history and philosophy of education.

After serving from 1953 to 1955 as program director at Coffman Union, University of Minnesota, he became the first director of parks and recreation in Edina, Minn., a fast-growing Minneaplois suburb. Initially, as a one-man department, his job was to start from scratch and provide a varied and balanced recreation program for the people of that community. His achievements there were notable examples of excellence in parks and recreation planning, development, and administration.

During the same period of time, Clif was an active proponent of a much-needed metropolitan parks system in the Twin Cities area. He served in a citizen league committee seeking metropolitan park enabling legislation that was eventually enacted in 1955. The Hennepin County Park Reserve District, created in 1957 as a result of that legislation, set about acquiring large, natural tracts of land that would encourage people to explore natural settings while enjoying outdoor recreation opportunities. Development within the 24,000-acre park system includes restoration of forests, marshes, and prairie, making possible the return and perpetuation of native wildlife. Clif remains a staunch advocate for the conservation of natural resources in a fast-growing metropolitan area.

In 1962, after a nationwide search for its first park superintendent, the district's board of commissioners hired Clif French to help build and guide what today is a nationally recognized park system. As a matter of fact, just a few years ago, I am proud that the park reserve district received the Sports Foundation's Grand Award for excellence in the field of park and recreation management.

Clif's accomplishments are certainly many, but one important example of his exemplary leadership can be illustrated by his influence in the district's participation and development of a Twin Cities regional recreation open space system. In 1974, the Hennepin County Park Reserve District joined six other counties and the Twin Cities Metropolitan Council in advocating legislation empowering the council to plan a regional park system as well as provide capital financing in the amount of $40 million for acquisition and development of regional parks for the entire region. Believing that by working together agencies can combine resources for mutual benefit, the district, under the professional guidance of Clif, led the way in establishing significant cooperative agreements with metro area counties and muncipalities to achieve a system of regional parks. Since the initial $40 million commitment in 1974, over $50 million additional funding has been pledged for regional park acquisition and development. Again, much to Clif's influence and leadership.

Clif also pushed for renovation of a major dam which today serves as an outstanding Mississippi River recreation area. He led the way for the creation of a two-county Scott-Hennepin Park Board that illustrated how neighboring counties can cooperate in a multicounty approach to systemwide park planning, acquisition, development, and operations. He advanced one of the more far-reaching multipurpose regional trail corridors for hiking, biking, cross-country skiing, snowmobiling, horseback riding, and running that stretches over 40 miles while traversing six municipalities in one of the fastest developing areas of the metropolitan area.

Clif French has been active in professional recreation associations, particularly the Minnesota Recreation and Park Association. He has served the MRPA as its president, vice president, and as chairman over the years of several committees such as legislative, registration and certification, continuing education, membership, history, nominating, and other ad hoc special project committees.

In terms of the National Recreation and Park Association, Clif has held various committee assignments including Minnesota's representative on the Great Lakes Distict Committee, Chairman of the NRPA Personnel Committee and on the APRS Continuing Education Committee. He currently serves on the board of directors of NSPR branch of NRPA and vice president of the National Association of County Park and Recreation Officials. Last October, Clif was the program chairman for the 1981 NRPA Congress in Minneapolis.

Now Clif is not without faults. His driving exploits and quest to get from one place to another are legendary. His consumption of ice cream is almost in direct relationship to the national debt. And his windy speeches and internal barometer would shame many politicians.

But Clif French is a successful man. On my office wall words from Ralph Waldo Emerson and his definition of "success" stare at me. The words read:

To laugh often and much, to win the respect of intelligent people and the affection of children, to earn the appreciation of honest critics and endure the betrayal of false friends, to appreciate beauty, to find the best in others, to leave the world a bit better whether by a healthy child or garden paths or a redeemed social condition, to know even one life has breathed easier because you have lived, this is to have succeeded.

These words describe Clif French. His 20 years as superintendent of the Hennepin County Park Reserve District and over 30-year career in the field of parks and recreation reflects great personal dedication to providing a better quality of life for everyone in our leisure-oriented society. He is a person whose place in the history of parks and recreation in the State of Minnesota will be long remembered. In Minnesota's park and recreation professional arena, Clif is considered the old timer—the guy who's constantly stirring the pot for the betterment of a higher quality of life for all people. Clif considers that charge of betterment one of the highest callings. His dedication, his drive for excellence, his indefatigable enthusiasm, and his willing to help others are all synonymous with the name Clif French. And, that's what people think of this man. My congratulations to Clif and his lovely wife, Jo, are sincere. Thanks on behalf of so many people.

THE FTC USED CAR RULE

● Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, Senator DANFORTH, and Senator GORTON, I would like to call to the attention of the Senate the recent mushrooming of editorial opinion in favor of the Federal Trade Commission's used car rule—and against the proposed congressional veto of this rule.

Since Congress adjourned at the end of last session without completing action on the used car rule, the FTC has resubmitted the rule to Congress for another 90-day review period. A disapproval resolution, Senate Concurrent Resolution 60, was introduced on January 28, again sponsored by Senator PRESSLER. As in the last session, the disapproval resolution has been referred to the Commerce Committee, which I chair, for initial consideration.

However, beginning last fall, and accelerating through December and January, editorial after editorial, appearing in newspapers all across the country, has endorsed the FTC's used car rule. So far, I have counted some 23 editorials from major newspapers in Philadelphia, Salt Lake City, San Francisco, Buffalo, White Plains, Nashville, New York City, Long Island, St. Louis, Pittsburgh, Syracuse, St. Paul, Fort Worth, Des Moines, Birmingham, Washington, D.C., and several smaller cities. Newspapers like the New York Times, the Washington Post, and the Philadelphia Inquirer have endorsed the FTC's rule.

These editorials are rightly critical of Congress for its widespread and somewhat reflective opposition to the used car rule in the last session. The newspapers argue—and I agree—that the FTC's proposal to require used car dealers to disclose warranty terms and disclose the existence of major defects known to the dealers is a modest, focused, and well-justified consumer protection regulation. Requirements for the disclosure of information, so that consumers may make informed purchasing decisions, is a traditional, market-oriented approach to regulation. Such a rule is especially justified in the case of used car sales because of the expense involved, the complexity of the product, and because the used car dealer usually knows a great deal more about the product than prospective purchasers.

Nationally syndicated columnists like William Raspberry, Jane Bryant Quinn, Sylvia Porter, and Jack Anderson have also criticized congressional opposition to the rule.

I urge my colleagues in the Senate to consider the merits of the FTC used car rule carefully before they cosponsor Senate Concurrent Resolution 60 or otherwise commit themselves to a veto of the rule. In particular, I hope the cosponsors of the disapproval resolution last session will reevaluate their positions and not automatically commit themselves again.

Mr. President, I ask that the editorials I have referred to and the nationally syndicated columns be printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

The material follows:

USED-CAR RULE, OR OVERRULE?

The Federal Trade Commission thinks that auto dealers should be required to inform buyers about known defects—a leaky radiator, a cracked engine head—in the used cars they sell. Congress, which has the last word on Commission decisions, is now debating the issue.

More is at stake in the debate than the rules of the used-car game. By second-guessing the F.T.C. on a relatively minor regulatory issue, Congress is in effect opening its doors to every other special interest that failed to get its way with independent agencies.

The Federal Trade Commission's staff spent years investigating abuses in the used-car business. In August, the commissioners rejected a staff proposal to require inspections by dealers before sale. Instead they chose a simple disclosure rule: when a dealer knows about a defect, he has to say so on the window sticker.

If this lemon-aid ruling had been made in, say, 1979, that would have been the end of it. The decision might have been appealed in the courts but with little hope of success. Last year, however, under pressure from business groups, Congress passed the F.T.C. Improvement Act.

That barred outright commission action on a number of contested issues, including life insurance, agricultural marketing coops, brand name protection and children's television advertising. More important here, it gave the House and Senate 90 days to veto F.T.C. rules. The used-car decision is the first significant rule to be tested.

The car dealers are almost certain to win in Congress: 41 senators and 206 representatives are cosponsors of the veto resolution. According to Congress Watch, three Congressional co-sponsors in five received campaign contributions last year from the National Automobile Dealers Association. Among nonsponsors, only one in five benefited from the dealers' largess.

The used-car rule would make life easier, providing modest protection to buyers without unduly burdening sellers. But even if it is vetoed, life, and the used-car market, will go on.

What is most troubling about the veto is the invitation it offers to others. Currently, Congressmen can deflect special interests by deferring to the experts on the independent regulatory agencies. But if Congress now starts looking over agency shoulders, that option will disappear.

How long before there are "improvement" acts that permit Congressional second-guessing of the daily proceedings of the Federal Communications Commission, the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission or the Nuclear Regulatory Commission? For that matter, how much longer will there be any independent regulators at all?

HELP FOR USED-CAR BUYERS

The nation's used-car dealers have spent a great deal of time, effort and campaign contribution money in recent months to convince Congress that they can't live with a proposed Federal Trade Commission rule requiring them to disclose defects in the used cars they sell.

Actually, the rule in question is a very mild attempt to bring a measure of respectability to a market with a reputation for shoddy dealing. When the FTC proposed the rule last August—and rejected the much stiffer controls it had previously entertained—the measure was denounced by consumer advocacy groups as a weak-kneed response to the dealer misrepresentation problems disclosed in six years of investigations and hearings.

The rule does not require dealers to inspect used cars before selling them or make any warranty whatever with respect to their performance. The dealer would simply have to put a sticker on the car listing any defects that he knows about. The FTC estimates the cost of the sticker at 18 cents.

The dealers claim that the possibility of lawsuits by disgruntled customers will force them to inspect all their used cars at considerable additional cost. We can think of a worse place than a world in which used-car dealers made a good-faith effort to let customers know what they're buying. But let's grant that even the strongest rule could be circumvented and that adding costs should not be ignored.

The FTC finds that most car dealers already inspect cars before they buy them. They don't want to get stung. Some, particularly those in the no-warranty-buy-as-is business don't inspect, and they wouldn't have to under the rule. Requiring disclosure of known defects might give a customer an added incentive to sue if he bought a lemon, but the customer would still have to prove that the dealer knew about the defect and disguised it. Without access to dealer inspection records, that would be difficult to prove.

Might it be that some dealers already know a lot they're not telling about the defects of the cars they sell? That thought doesn't seem to concern the more than 205 congressmen who are sponsoring a resolution to overturn the FTC rule. Federal Election Commission records show, by the way, that campaign contributions have gone to about 85 percent of the sponsors from the car dealers' PAC.

Opponents of the rule hope to force the measure from committee, perhaps today, and push it to quick passage on the floor. That would be unfortunate. The rule is not likely to do any harm to honest dealers, and it might do customers some real good.

[From the Philadelphia Inquirer, Jan. 3, 1982]

LET BUYER (AND VOTER) BEWARE

Acting under a law enacted last year, the Senate Commerce Committee has voted to exercise Congress' authority to veto a rule issued by the Federal Trade Commission.

The rule, adopted after more than five years of hearings, was intended to correct a "pattern of deceptive practices" that the commission said it had found over the years in the used-car business. In its considerably watered-down final version, the rule would not require dealers to make full disclosure of defects or—as the commission had proposed several months ago—affix window stickers of "OK," "not OK" or "no rating." It would not even require inspection of the merchandise.

All it would require is that they affix stickers listing any defects they know of and stating whether the car is covered under any kind of warranty.

Even that, though, was too much for the used-car industry, which mounted a furious campaign against the rule, and the wheels seem greased in Congress for striking it down. In the Senate, 47 co-sponsors, and in the House, 211, have signed the veto resolution.

What tender solicitude for the dealers. What crass indifference to the public interest. Would you buy a used car from this Congress?

[From the Philadelphia Daily News, Dec. 5, 1981]

LEMON-AID

Bills are up for consideration in both the House and Senate next week that could kill a Federal Trade Commission ruling aimed at protecting buyers of used cars.

Chances of the FTC rule standing are about equal to your getting 10,000 miles out of a transmission filled with sawdust and heavy oil. For the mighty National Association of Automobile Dealers has both spoken and spent money.

Mainly, it has spent money—carloads full—on "right-minded" legislators who will be casting their votes in the days ahead.

Before we go into that, it might be well to look at what the FTC rule would force used car dealers to do: Paste a sticker on a window of their little beauties saying that they know of nothing major that's wrong with the car. The FTC rule would not demand that the dealer tear the car apart to find out if the thing is terminally ill. In fact, a section of the sticker would read: ". . . there may be defects that are unknown to the dealer. If nothing is listed, the car is not necessarily free of defects."

Even in its present watery state, however, the law would do one thing. It would provide a $10,000 fine for each violation. Presumably, a few crooked dealers would stop selling cars they knew were certifiable lemons out of fear that enough of their customers would write the FTC about them to bring about an investigation.

We don't mean to imply here that every used car dealer is an unrepentant crook. The majority of decent dealers want to stay in business and that means repeat customers.

But the NADA doesn't see it that way. It casts doubt on the honesty of the majority of its own membership by demanding that dishonest dealers be protected from federal laws aimed at stopping abuses in the industry.

According to Congress Watch, the Ralph Nader group which keeps a close eye on such things, NADA has so far passed out $571,626 in campaign contributions—to 85 percent of the co-sponsors of legislation to kill the FTC ruling.

Which may prove one thing: Never buy a used car from a congressman.

[From the Johnstown (Pa.) Tribune-Democrat, Aug. 22, 1981]

LEMONS OLD AND NEW

The Federal Trade Commission has approved a rule that, if approved by the Congress, could revolutionize the used-car industry.

It would do that by requiring dealers who sell five or more used vehicles a year to put a sticker on a window to let prospective buyers have some idea about the condition of the vehicle, including a listing of known defects.

What that will do to the image, deserved or not, of the used-car dealer is easy to imagine: the slicker will be turned into an angel of sorts, at least if he plays according to the rules.

Meanwhile, in anticipation of the sticker regulation—which could take effect in about six months—the National Automobile Dealers Association's executive director has said his group is "pretty shocked and surprised" it made it through FTC channels. He said the NADA is most upset by the known-defect part of the sticker because it is too vague.

Too vague? Just list, honestly, what has not been fixed on a used car and then let the buyer beware but also be informed. Nothing difficult about that.

Of course the sticker idea can't possibly do a complete job of listing what is wrong with used cars, but it would be a nice try; and considering the way a lot of new cars deteriorate practically from the moment they leave the showroom, it is just unfortunate that a warning sticker cannot be devised for them too.

[From the Des Moines (Iowa) Tribune, Dec. 23, 1981]

BUYERS MISUSED

Repeated complaints about used-car sales practices led the Federal Trade Commission to investigate, and after five years it summarized two major problems: (1) Used-car dealers sometimes misrepresent the condition of their cars; (2) consumers often do not understand the meaning of "as is."

The FTC proposed a rule to require used-car dealers to post a window sticker on each car explaining what warranty, if any, is offered, and the meaning of "as is" (that the dealer makes no written promises, and the buyer is stuck for the cost of repairing any defects).

The rule would require that the dealer list on the sticker any major defects of which he is aware, such as a serious oil leak, a cracked engine block or nearly bald tires. The rule would not require dealers to inspect cars or search for defects—only to list the obvious ones or those that had come to their attention.

The car dealers have launched a major lobbying effort, backed by generous campaign contributions, to persuade Congress to veto the FTC rule. Many senators and representatives have signed as co-sponsors of a resolution to kill the rule, and the House and Senate Commerce Committees have approved it.

This would be in keeping with the anti-government, anti-regulation mood in Washington. Clearly, though, some regulations are more justified than others. Car buyers who are tired of being cheated at used-car lots ought to let their representatives and senators know that they have opinions worth listening to. They may not contribute as richly to campaign chests as used-car dealers have done—but they vote.

[From the Hollywood (Fla.) Sun-Tattler, Dec. 26, 1981]

USED CAR RULE WOULD BE AID

A proposed Federal Trade Commission rule on used car sales seems modest enough. It would require dealers to put a sticker on the window of each car advising buyers of any "known" major defects and the terms of any warranties they offer.

It might be supposed that, as a matter of course, a reputable dealer would not palm off a vehicle with a major defect on an unsuspecting customer and that the dealer would tell the buyer if a warranty goes with the car.

Yet, the rule has stirred a storm of protest on Capitol Hill and the guess is that members of Congress, many of whom have received campaign contributions from dealer trade groups, will veto it.

Congress last year gave itself the right to override any FTC regulation by a majority vote of both houses within 90 days after the regulation is proposed.

Actually, the proposed rule is a watered-down version of a stiffer regulation that the FTC and used car dealers argued about for five years. The original proposal would have required dealers to inspect cars and tell consumers of any problems the cars have. The new rule specifically says that inspections are not required.

The Reagan administration seems to be of two minds. Virginia Knauer, director of the White House Office of Consumer Affairs, supports the proposed regulation. But a top official of the Office of Management and Budget wrote congressional sponsors of the veto resolution that Knauer's view was her own and that the "paperwork burden this rule would impose has been a matter of some concern to us."

Well, we suppose there is some burden in sticking a single sheet of paper on each car.

But we suspect that the main opposition from dealers comes from a fear of losing sales by being frank with customers about defects or getting sued if they aren't.

If Congress overturns the regulation, prospective used car buyers will have to continue to assume it's "buyer beware" on a lot of used car lots.

Congress should resist the temptation to blow the whistle on the FTC—and should give the proposed regulation the green light.

[From the Pittsburgh-Post Gazette, Dec. 11, 1981]

GOOD DEAL FOR BAD DEALERS

Used-car buyers should complain loudly about the so-called "lemon aid" resolution recently passed by a House Commerce subcommittee. In a 3-2 vote Tuesday, the panel urged Congress to veto a Federal Trade Commission regulation to require used-car dealers to tell a customer of known defects in a car prior to sale. Congress is expected to oblige the committee enthusiastically.

The FTC regulation seems like a small enough concession to an often deceived class of consumers. But as a precedent, congressional veto of the rule would raise even more troubling prospects. If Congress blocks this wholly desirable rule, warranted by numerous examples of past abuse, how long would it be before other FTC rules would be ambushed by special interests?

That prospect also promises to stick Congress with a reputation comparable to that of the car dealers who want to escape the rule. So if the resolution against defect disclosure passes both houses, the relevant question for consumers may well be: "Would you buy a used car from this Congress?"

[From the Salt Lake City Deseret News, Dec. 7, 1981]

TRUTH IN THE USED CAR BUSINESS?

Ralph Nader and his cohorts are picking on Congress again. This time, Nader's Congress Watch is accusing various congressmen of letting their votes be influenced by contributions from the National Automobile Dealers Association.

The fuss is over a move by Congress to veto a ruling the Federal Trade Commission issued in August. The ruling would require that used car dealers inform customers of any mechanical defects they know about in the cars they sell. Congress has the power to veto such rulings within 90 days after the rulings are issued. No action has been taken yet.

The regulation, if put into effect, could throw used car dealing into confusion. Imagine! Anyone selling a used car and telling the customer: "The shocks are gone, the valves need grinding, and the frame's been bent in a collision." It's unthinkable.

Experienced buyers might suspect the dealer was trying to hide the fact that the vehicle really was a creampuff that formerly belonged to a teacher who lived next door to the school.

Congressmen have a right to worry about the truth in vending rule because someone might get the idea that it should be extended to politics. If candidates were required to list the flaws in their campaign promises, it would kill the political system as we know it.

As for the contributions of $7,000 to $9,000 given the congressmen, may be the NADA was just trying to make sure these hard-working public servants won't have to buy used cars. What other reason could there possibly be for such generosity?

[From the New York News World, Dec. 7, 1981]

SHOULD GOVERNMENT KICK TIRES FOR CONSUMERS?

The Federal Trade Commission is fighting for a regulation requiring car dealers to tell potential customers about defects. You know. Little things like a cracked block, worn-out brakes, balding tires and the need for a valve job.

The FTC says it would only cost about 18 cents a car to comply. The National Auto Dealers Administration says the bill would be more like $150.

In these days of understandable and justified resentment toward federal regulations, it looks as if the FTC's plan is likely to go down to defeat before the House and Senate.

That would be a shame. There are plenty of regulations which we agree are unnecessary and harmful to the economy, but this isn't one of them.

Buying a car, even a used one, is a big investment to most Americans, many of whom depend on it for their job and daily necessities like school or shopping. Allowing used car hucksters free rein is hitting Americans where they live.

That old maxim, "Let the buyer beware," doesn't provide much comfort when one is stuck out on the freeway, watching steam rise from the radiator and oil pour from the engine.

[From the Post-Standard, Syracuse, N.Y., Nov. 9, 1981]

LUMPS FOR LEE

Congressman Gary Lee earned himself some harsh criticism from our columnist Jack Anderson the other day because of Lee's support of the used car lobby. We'd like to add a few lumps of our own.

Anderson took Lee to task for dancing to the car lobby tune by opposing a Federal Trade Commission attempt to force dealers to disclose defects in used cars they sell. He noted that Lee had accepted a campaign contribution of $3,000 from the dealers in 1980.

The dealers complain that if the FTC rule is approved they would have to inspect every car before it is sold, thus adding to their expenses and ultimately to consumer cost.

We find that argument more than a little suspect. Any person who has ever traded in his old jalopy on a newer one knows that the dealer looks over the trade-in more than casually before setting a value on the clunker. The dealer thus already has the inspection in hand and could certainly pass it on to a potential buyer at little or no extra cost.

One would think that with the depressed economy the car dealers would be doing everything possible to polish their image and taking positive steps to stimulate sales. Instead they are giving every appearance of throwing money at Congress in hopes of being able to freely peddle lemons to an unsuspecting public.

Lee was singled out by Anderson because he introduced the offensive legislation in the House, but he was not alone. According to Anderson, the bills in the House and Senate to thwart the FTC have some 150 sponsors.

A spokesman for Lee labeled the Anderson exposure "silly" and said that it is ridiculous to even suggest that a congressional vote could be bought for a few dollars. We don't find it "silly" that the dealers put more than $1 million into congressional pockets last year nor are we so naive as to believe they expected nothing for it.

The dealers and their political allies should try to remember that the days of caveat emptor have been fading. This latest ploy is hardly going to do the dealers much good in the public eye, even if they are successful, and Lee has hardly endeared himself to the driving public that votes.

[From the Herald-Dispatch, Huntington, W. Va., Nov. 25, 1981]

AUTO DEALERS' CAMPAGIN GIFTS TAINT DEBATE ON USED-CAR RULE

The Federal Trade Commission issued an order in August requiring that used-car dealers inform their customers of any mechanical defects they know about. Given the widespread abuses that go on in the selling of used cars—abuses that give the industry's many reputable dealers an unfair black eye—such a requirement seems hardly unreasonable.

Congress, however, empowered itself last year to veto any FTC regulation within 90 days of when it is issued, and to date nearly half the members of the House and Senate have become co-sponsors of resolution to veto the FTC used-car rule.

Now comes the public-interest organization Congress Watch with a report that the National Automobile Dealers Association has made more than $500,000 in campaign contributions to those lawmakers co-sponsoring the veto resolutions.

"If Congress vetoes this rule, it will be inviting business groups that can't make their cases before an impartial decision-maker on the basis of the facts and the law to come to Congress and make their cases on the basis of campaign contributions," says Jay Angoff of Congress Watch.

NADA spokeswoman Penelope Longbottom has declined comment on the Congress Watch report, saying the group has not seen a copy of it. And, not surprisingly, spokesmen in the offices of several of the lawmakers receiving the contributions insist that there is no connection between the campaign funds and their opposition.

That may well be.

It is, however, an axiom of public life that one must avoid not only impropriety but also the appearance of impropriety. In their haste to pocket the used-car dealers' money, a number of lawmakers seem to have forgotten that little piece of wisdom.

[From the Dispatch, St. Paul, Minn., Nov. 28, 1981]

A PROBLEM OF APPEARANCES

The flap caused by a House resolution to veto regulations covering used car dealers is a classic example of the problems associated with campaign fund raising.

The resolution to veto Federal Trade Commission regulations is sponsored by 206 House members, 175 of whom have received a total of $476,000 in campaign contributions from the political action committee of the National Automobile Dealers Association. Minnesota's Rep. Vin Weber, a first-term Republican representing the Sixth district, is both a sponsor of the resolution and a recipient of $8,000 from NADA.

This situation has prompted Congress Watch, an arm of Ralph Nader's consumer-protection organization, to accuse congressmen of trading votes for political contributions. Naturally, the congressmen, including Weber, have denied this.

The rush to protect used car dealers is unseemly, since the regulation in question hardly looks ruinous. It would only require the dealers to inform potential car buyers of mechanical defects that have come to the dealers' attention.

However, it is impossible to look into a congressman's heart and accuse him of being untruthful when he says he was not influenced by the NADA campaign contribution. House members could very well believe the regulation would cause increased unemployment in "an already depressed auto industry," as Weber says.

The problem is one of appearances, brought about by the financing of campaigns with money from groups representing special interests.

Like it or not, elected officials will be identified with their contributors as long as this system of financing political campaigns continues. If members of Congress want to avoid this sort of thing, they will have to get their campaign money from sources other than special-interest organizations such as NADA.

[From the Fort Worth, Tex. Star Telegram, Dec. 10, 1981]

FTC RULE A GOOD ONE

By coincidence, two widely disparate stories about used car dealers appeared in the Star-Telegram on the same day last week. It was one of those classic good news-bad news situations.

The good news: A used car dealer in White Bear Lake, Minn.—touched by the sight of a man, accompanied by his two small children, shopping on foot for a car in freezing weather—sold the man a 1973-model auto for $1.

The bad news: Spurred by the used car industry, Congress appears likely to veto a Federal Trade Commission rule that would require dealers to inform customers of known defects in the vehicles they are trying to sell.

Protests from the National Automobile Dealers Association notwithstanding, there is certainly nothing unreasonable about a requirement to reveal known defects in a product to prospective buyers. In fact, one would expect reputable dealers to be happy to do so without being required.

A spokesman for the car dealers complained during a House subcommittee hearing that the FTC rule would require detailed inspections of cars that would add $150 per car to the cost. However, FTC Commissioner Patricia Bailey said the rule specifically says that no such inspection is required. And an independent automotive consultant said that he offers a diagnostic service covering three times as much as the maximum number of potential defects outlined by the FTC rule for $30.

Wendell Miller, president of NADA, told the subcommittee that the rule "indicates a total insensitivity and lack of concern for the plight of retail automobile and truck dealers." To the contrary, it indicates to us a great deal of sensitivity for the beleaguered consumer in search of honesty and reliable products in the marketplace.

Many members of Congress, however, apparently don't agree with us. Nearly half of the members of the House and Senate have co-sponsored resolutions to veto the rule before it takes effect. Could their position have been influenced by the fact that NADA has distributed more than $500,000 in campaign contributions to sponsors of the veto resolutions during the past couple of years? Surely not.

USED-CAR DEFECTS

A set of rules recently issued by the Federal Trade Commission, that seem reasonable on their face—they would require used-car dealers to tell customers of any defects of which they are aware—has run into considerable difficulty in Congress. That is probably not too surprising since the car-dealers lobby has been exerting a vigorous and free-spending campaign in hopes of killing the rules.

The basis of the battle is this: the FTC issued the regulations last summer after six years of investigation and public hearings. But congress has given itself the power to veto such regulations within a certain time frame. And so far, 43 Senators and 206 Representatives have joined in sponsoring a bill that would provide the veto.

So the future looks dim for an intelligent set of safeguards for the consumer. If a car dealer knows that that wheezing old gas guzzler isn't hitting on all cylinders, then, why, in the name of fairness, shouldn't he be obligated to tell the prospective buyer? Virginia Knauer, President Reagan's consumer adviser, calls the rules a "reasonable, straightforward and uncomplicated approach" that will provide "significant benefits" to the consumer.

One must be sympathetic to car salesmen, since they are part of an industry that has been having its share of economic longueurs, and any additional burden will hurt. But Jay Angoff of the public-interest group, Congress Watch, tells us the used-car industry is evidently doing quite well. In 1980, consumers sought 18.66 million used cars for $70.8 billion, both record highs, and in the first nine months of 1981, used-car prices increased 31 percent.

There is also the sense that we do better in this country with fewer regulations; that we don't need the ministrations of a national nanny to poke us into virtue. But the present FTC regulation is a watered-down version of a rule that would have required the dealers to inspect their cars—a tougher rule that certainly would have increased costs. When the dealers opposed this mandatory inspection, they expressly supported a rule like the present one.

This is a straightforward matter of giving the prospective buyer a fair break. The House and Senate should back off and let the FTC's rule stand.

EDITORIALS—GUNNING FOR USED-CAR PROTECTION

Do congressmen buy only new cars? Are they afraid of losing campaign contributions from car dealers? The way some of them are gunning for a mild little rule designed to protect buyers from unscrupulous used-car salesmen, you'd think so.

About 175 House members and 35 senators are co-sponsoring a resolution to kill a simple used-car sales regulation adopted by the Federal Trade Commission this year. They are buying the dealers' argument that the rule would increase used-car costs without benefiting consumers.

But that's nonsense. The rule simply requires a dealer to list any defects he knows a used car to have. That's simple enough—something you'd expect a reputable dealer to do anyway. In fact, when Long Island car dealers were questioned about a somewhat stronger proposal last year, most praised it as offering them protection from dishonest competitors.

But the trade groups whimper that competitive pressures would force dealers to inspect all their used cars, even if they weren't required to, at considerable cost.

That amounts to an admission that car dealers don't check out their used cars, which means they have no idea whether their goods are sound or fairly priced. How any industry can admit that without embarrassment is beyond us.

Earlier FTC testimony showed that used-car prices declined in Wisconsin after the state passed a car-inspection law—because dealers had to allow for the cost of needed repair work. The fear of a price drop may have a lot to do with the dealers' opposition.

Luckily, this anti-comsumer measure is in its infancy, and it needn't win passage. To their credit, New York's senators and Long Island's representative are not among the co-sponsors. So far, so good. If and when it comes to a vote, we hope they are still on the same side of the issue.

POWER OF THE USED-CAR LOBBY

The power of the used car lobby is being demonstrated by the way in which members of Congress are lining up against a proposed Federal Trade Commission rule. Under the rule, which until Dec. 14 Congress has the option to veto, used-car dealers would have to display window stickers disclosing any defects known to the dealer and any warranties offered, and stating that buyers are rsponsible for any repairs on any vehicle sold "as is." So far 206 House members and 41 senators are reported ready to block the rule; 218 are needed in the House and 51 in the Senate.

In the Missouri congressional delegation, nine members oppose the rule. Only Sen. Danforth has publicly supported it. Reps. William Clay and Richard Bolling have not indicated a position. Of the nine Missouri opponents, all but Rep. Emerson of De Soto have received campaign contributions from the National Automobile Dealers Association, which dispensed more than $500,000 over a 30-month period ending last June. Two recipients, Reps. Bailey of Willow Springs and Taylor of Sarcoxie, are themselves auto dealers. These two should at least have the grace not to vote on an issue in which they have a special interest.

A spokesman for Sen. Danforth disputed opponents' claim that the rule would be difficult to implement—a point that the FTC also rejected after nine years of consideration. Rep. Gephardt contends that the rule would be useless. But a rule requiring basically that more information be given auto buyers surely provides more protection than exists now.

[From the News, Buffalo, N.Y., Dec. 12, 1981]

AID TO USED CAR BUYER

The old maxim, "Let the buyer beware," has always been especially applicable in buying used cars. The inevitable hazards can be minimized to some degree by going to a dealer you trust, by various warranties or by having the car checked over by your mechanic, but some uncertainty is bound to remain. The Federal Trade Commission is now attempting to assist the consumer with a modest new disclosure rule.

After years of study of problems and abuses in the used car business, the FTC staff recommended that dealers be compelled to inspect 12 major systems in their cars and inform prospective buyers of any defects. Not surprisingly, there was an instant outcry from auto dealers across the nation. Such detailed inspections would obviously add to their costs, which would be added to the price of used cars.

The FTC commissioners decided—rightly, we think—that this would be an unnecessary federal intrusion into the auto business. Instead, they decided on an exceedingly modest rule—that if dealers know about some defect, they must tell the public about it on a window sticker. All they would have to do would be to check off OK, Not OK or Don't Know for various items.

Amazingly, there is still an outcry from the nation's auto dealers. Even more amazingly, nearly half the members of Congress—41 senators and 207 representatives—have joined in sponsoring a bill to veto the FTC plan. The auto dealers have obviously been effective in getting their message across.

Congress, however, surely has better things to do than to marshal its forces to stike down such a modest little regulation, which at worst can do no harm and at best might do a little good.

[From the Reporter Dispatch, White Plains, N.Y., Dec. 18, 1981]

CONGRESS PLAYS USED-CAR GAME

With so many matters affecting national well-being and even survival on the agenda, we wonder if some congressmen find it a little silly to be discussing decals on used car windshields.

The principle of lowering the level of regulation by government agencies is valid, but Congress let itself in for some uncongressional diversions and pressures when it bestowed upon itself the power of veto over rulings of independent regulatory agencies. If the Federal Trade Commission went too far in trying to require automobile dealers to inform potential buyers about known defects in the used cars they sell, Congress is beyond its depth taking on evaluation of individual judgments by executive branch agencies.

The matter of windshield stickers has been put over until the next session of Congress after the lawmakers seemed to have been on the way to their precedent-setting veto. This maneuver in itself is disturbing, because it raises the prospect of dozens of little cases rattling around the Capitol, with advocates and opponents needling and pandering to congressmen and time-wasting maneuvers like filibusters threatened while more important matters dangle on the vine.

In one sense the veto legislation may be useful in spite of itself, since it may persuade the FTC and other regulatory agencies to be more cautious in promulgating unpopular and overreaching rules. But what is needed and what is unpopular may be, and usually are, two different things. The proper remedies are the integrity of the executive process and appeals to the courts.

When Congress has solved all the other ills of the nation it can concentrate on keeping used-car salesmen honest.

[From the Tennessean, Nashville, Tenn., Dec. 8, 1981.]

CONGRESS SHOULD LET FTC'S USED-CAR RULE GO THROUGH

A strong effort is being made in Congress to veto a Federal Trade Commission rule that would require used-car dealers to tell customers about known defects in the vehicles they are trying to sell.

The used-car industry, in testimony before congressional committees, claimed the rule would require dealers to inspect vehicles put up for sale at a cost of $150 per car.

The FTC says this is not so, that no inspection would be required and that all dealers would have to do is tell customers about any defects they know about, such as a leaky battery, an inoperable air conditioner, cracked block or other obvious problems.

The industry is afraid that any additional cost for a used car will create "a competitive disadvantage" for dealers, since private sales of used cars are not covered. But an FTC official said the rule would cost only 18 cents per car, not the $150 the industry claims. An independent automotive consultant said he offers a diagnostic service that covers three times as much as what the FTC rule would require for $30 per car.

Some members of the Congress want the FTC to rewrite the rule to make it easier on the dealers. But the FTC refuses. "The rule does not require dealers to inspect cars offered for sale," FTC Commissioner Patricia Bailey told a House committee hearing. "We tried to make the fact as clear as the English language permits."

The commission is right. It should not weaken the rule. A rule that requires a dealer to tell a customer only about the defects he knows about without an inspection is already weak enough.

That loophole could permit unscrupulous dealers to get away with all kinds of swindles by claiming they "didn't know about" this defect or that one in cars they have sold and that have turned out to be worthless.

The used-car industry appears to be trying to take advantage of what it perceives to be an anti-regulatory sentiment in Congress fostered by the Reagan administration in order to avoid just regulation of its own operations. Congress should not cooperate in this. The public needs the protection of this rule and it should not be vetoed.

There is nothing wrong with requiring a used car dealer to tell a customer about any defects he knows of in a car he is selling. It is hard to see anything wrong with requiring an inspection of the car to see that it is in good shape.

Most people buying a car priced at several thousand dollars might not object to paying a few dollars more to make sure the battery is not going to fall out or a wheel roll off as soon as the car is driven away from the used-car lot.

The consultant who testified, Mr. Pat Goss of Riverdale, Md., said disclosure of defects "would go a long way toward restoring public confidence in the used-car industry."

It might do that. An industry that would go to such lengths to keep from telling customers about the known defects in its product certainly needs to have some public confidence restored.

[From the Bend (Oreg.) Bulletin, Dec. 27, 1981]

PACKWOOD WAGES WORTHY FIGHT

Oregon's Sen. Bob Packwood has been fighting a sniper battle to save a much-needed Federal Trade Commission rule regarding used cars. If he succeeds, the old maxim that buying a used car is like buying someone else's troubles will be a little less true to life. If he fails—well, buyer beware.

The FTC set out a few years ago to curb what it calls "a pattern of deceptive practices" in the used car business. What it came up with is a moderate—almost feeble—little rule. The rule would require a dealer to post a sticker in the window of each used car on his lot, stating whether the car carried any warranty and listing any major defects known to the dealer. It also would say that the car might have other defects unknown to the dealer (a possibility with any used car). It wouldn't affect private sales, which account for half the used-car sales in the country.

Despite the rule's moderation, car dealers have lit into it with a vengeance. National Automobile Dealers Association officials urged Congress to veto the rule, saying it was an unwarranted burden on the industry. They whined that it would require expensive inspections and might make them liable for unknown defects. They even cried the economic blues: the rule, they wailed, "indicates a total insensitivity and lack of concern for the plight of the retail franchised automobile dealer and to the current economic condition in the real world."

Oh, my. That sounds awful. Fortunately, it bears little relation to reality. True, automobile dealers are having a hard time of it lately, but pasting up these little stickers won't send anyone into bankruptcy—unless his profit margin relies solely on lying to customers. The FTC estimates the rule will cost dealers next to nothing—18 cents to print the sticker and the brief time it takes to fill it out. No inspection would be required, according to Federal Trade Commissioner Patricia P. Bailey. If a car pulled to the right, that's all the dealer would have to disclose, unless he knew the reason, she said.

We're not convinced the rule will cure all the abuses in the used car market; its teeth are far too dull for that job. But it probably will reduce the most flagrant of deceptions. At any rate, it can't harm any honest dealer.

Nevertheless, NADA has marshaled formidable support at the Capitol. (Its extensive political contributions—$1 million in 1979-80—probably helped in that regard.) To prevent the veto, Packwood must defeat a pair of resolutions that boasted 47 cosponsors in the Senate and more than 200 in the House. Such numbers can be defeated, as Packwood knows from his AWACS experience: at one time he had 56 Senate cosponsors to veto the arms sale, but he ultimately lost. Still, victory on this issue is a distant hope.

Packwood managed to delay the veto until next year with some fancy parliamentary footwork, but it will be back. When it returns, the confrontation will be a classic one: a narrow, monied interest versus the well-being of the general public. Somehow, we don't find the prospects encouraging.

USED-CAR LOBBY IS WELL-TUNED ON CAPITAL HILL

(By Jack Anderson)

Ever wonder why the used car you bought breaks down shortly after you drive it home? Why the dealer didn't tell you that the horn didn't work or the radiator leaked?

One reason is that the used-car lobby is one of the most active, and most unpublicized, in Washington.

Except in a few states, dealers in "previously owned" vehicles don't have to disclose defects to potential buyers. The Federal Trade Commission would like to change that with a rule that would force the dealers to inform buyers about their warranty rights as well as defects such as cracked engine heads, damaged ball-joint seals, bad suspension systems and leakage in the transmission, cooling, brake and steering systems.

The lemon-peddlers, of course, don't like the FTC proposal, and they're flexing their muscle on Capitol Hill. The dealers' political action committee was the forth largest donor in the 1980 national elections. It coughed up $1,034,875 in political contributions, exceeded only by the National Association of Realtors, American Medical Association and United Auto Workers.

And as of Aug. 1, 1981, the committee had raised $378,000 for the 1982 elections.

Such figures tend to impress lawmakers, and many of the public's representatives on Capitol Hill appear to be persuaded by the dealers' arguments that the proposed FTC rule is ambigious, vague and too costly at a time when the industry is without question being pummeled by inflation and high interest rates.

On the House side, the No. 1 water boy for the dealers is the obscure Gary A. Lee (R-N.Y.). In 1980 he received one of his largest contributions: $3,000 from the used-car lobby. In the Senate, the charge is being led by Republican Larry Pressler, the handsome lightweight from South Dakota.

When Pressler was asked by home state car dealers to sponsor a resolution that would veto the FTC proposal, he agreed if the National Auto Dealers Association would draft the statement. The dealers happily complied. Lee introduced an identical resolution in the House.

Other members of the House who have benefited from the used-car lobby's largess and support killing the FTC ruling include Phil Gramm (D-Tex.), $6,200; James Collins (R-Tex.), $7,250; Thomas Bliley (R-Va.), $5,000; Ray Kogovsek (D-Colo.), $9,650; Stan Parris (R-Va.), $8,400; Frank Wolf (R-Va.), $8,000, and John Edward Porter (R-Ill.), $5,800. Oddly enough, Morris K. Udall, the liberal Democrat from Arizona, is supporting the dealers even though he received no contributions from them.

Three senators—Steve Symms (R-Idaho), Paul Laxalt (R-Nev.) and James Abdnor (R-S.D.)—received $10,000 each from the dealers in 1980.

The resolution to kill the proposed FTC regulation has over 150 co-sponsors in the House and Senate. My associate Tony Capaccio reviewed their campaign records and learned that the sponsors received at least $329,200 from the used-car dealers since 1980.

The dealers are claiming that the FTC rule, if passed, would force them to conduct expensive inspections. On close examination, however, this appears to be a specious argument. Most dealers thoroughly inspect used cars before they purchase them. The more likely reason for their concern is the prospect that, having bought a clunker, they would then be unable to foist it off on the public.

If the used-car regulation is killed, which is likely, lobbyists for such special interests as the funeral, hearing aid, mobile home and eyeglass industries can be expected to redouble their efforts to kill pending FTC proposals that would regulate them more strictly.

[From the Washington Post, Dec. 14, 1981]

IS THIS USED-CAR BILL A LEMON?

(By William Raspberry)

The used-car dealers of America must be embarrassed even in their prospective victory. They are fighting, with astonishing success so far, a proposal they say would unduly complicate their lives, drive up their costs and perhaps even force them out of business.

And what is this awful proposal? That they tell the truth about the cars they offer for sale.

The Federal Trade Commission has proposed a rule that would require dealers to disclose to customers any known defect involving such things as a car's engine, drive train, electrical system and brakes. They wouldn't have to repair the defects, only disclose the ones they know about.

The rule will become law unless Congress specifically rejects it. So far, 41 senators and 207 representatives are co-sponsors of a bill to do just that. Last week, both the House and Senate commerce committees voted to kill the FTC's used-car regulation. When it comes to selling used cars, a lots to the used-car-buying public. It's not much of a proposal.

An earlier version of the FTC recommendation would have required dealers to inspect 12 major systems of the cars they sell and then check a form disclosing whether they were in good working order. The dealers said that was too much, and the current proposal eliminates the necessity of inspection. Dealers would now have the option of checking "OK," "Not OK," or "Don't Know." The buyer would assume the risk for any defect the dealers said he didn't know about. The Automobiles Owners Action Council, a Washington-based consumer organization, says the current proposal is worse than no law at all. "It wouldn't protect the buyer, but it would create the illusion of protection," says Arars sold "as is" could return the vehicle for a full refund.

"Our concern with the initially proposed rule was that it was not enforceable and would be rendered ineffective because of the loophole provided by the dealers' 'not inspected' option," AOAC said in its official comment. "Indeed, the major concern of all consumer representatives, legal-service agencies and government officials was that the 'not inspected' option, unless coupled with a cooling-off period, would result not merely in a worthless [rule] but a federal regulation which would perpetuate deceptive practices in the used-car industry."

But if the proposal is as weak as the AOAC contends, why would the used-car dealers object to it? Surely the "paper work" burden of checking off 12 items cannot be the problem—particularly with the "Don't Know" option. Surely it cannot be because of the added cost of mandatory inspection, since the requirement for inspection has been stricken. Perhaps used-car dealers, like their horse-trader forebears, think the right to deceive is central to their ability to do business.

Admittedly there are difficulties in enforcing honesty in the business. Most dealers conduct at least a cursory inspection before they acquire a used car in the first place. That is how they determine how much to pay for the car, or how much to allow in trade. If the brakes don't work, or if the steering is bad, the dealer finds out immediately. The problem is that it is impossible, absent a mandatory inspection, to prove that the dealer knew of specific defects.

But it's hard to see how even a marginally honest dealer could call it unfair to either reveal defects known to him or to claim he didn't know about them. Nor does it seem unduly burdensome to allow, as the AOAC recommends, a buyer who discovered undisclosed defects within three days to cancel the deal.

The Los Angeles County deputy district attorney, Gilbert Garcetti, put it this way: "A large percent of our complaints concern mechanical defects that surface within two or three days of the purchase date. The complaints nearly always state that the car was fine when they drove it off the lot but it wouldn't start a few hours later, or a serious mechanical defect surfaced within a few days."

Perhaps it shouldn't be surprising that the less-scrupulous used-car dealers would not want to unload a lemon only to have the victimized buyer bring it back in a day or two. But why should so many members of Congress lend their support to this anti-consumer attitude?

Jay Angoff, a lawyer with the Public Citizen Congress Watch, offers a clue: "The National Automobile Dealers' Association, whose members sell new and used cars, between January 1979 and June 1981, gave more than $500,000 in campaign contributions to congressmen and senators who are now co-sponsors of the veto resolutions," he said.

[From the Standard Times, New Bedford, Mass., Oct. 22, 1981]

AS IS USED CAR RULE BENEFITS MAJORITY

After years of inquiry, the Federal Trade Commission felt it had the evidence to issue a rule that would require used car dealers to tell you which basic guts of the metal you are buying are OK and which are not. The dealer could sell you the car "as is" with no guarantee of any kind, but would have to tell you that.

Car dealers have reacted to the FTC's "truth in used vehicles" rule with rage. "We can't let this thing get passed," says Charlie Hillard, first president of the National Independent Automobile Dealers Association in 1947. "We have a rule which we cannot just live with, Period" adds Chuck Nicholson, current NIADA president. The whole industry is up in arms, crying "foul," and pledging a fight.

But I've studied the rule, line by line, and wonder whether the FTC used car rule wouldn't benefit the vast majority of this vital industry—the honest dealers.

The rule would require a checklist to be provided to you, the buyer, describing the car's vital statistics and whether such key elements as the brakes passed simple tests (which might save your life). It doesn't require the honest used car dealer to do anything the dealer doesn't want to do. It does require that you be told (a) what you are getting, (b) whether it is OK, and (c) what, if anything, the dealer will do if it turns out not to be OK.

PAPERWORK RULE

It's true that the FTC rule is a paperwork rule and like anything else that's done, costs something.

But the costs of providing the fundamental ABC information the rule requires must be minimal. So we come back to the suspicion that the real reason for the attack is that the FTC is very vulnerable these days. It has been zapped so often that anything it does automatically invites attack.

The FTC think-tankers are primarily responsible for their own troubles, for during the late Nixon-Carter years, they concluded that industrywide rulemaking to remold the American economic system was a better use of the agency's thin resources than doing too much work looking into individual cases of fraud against you, the consumer. Some FTC rules drew lots of flak, such as its projected ban on most TV advertising aimed at children. Industry's bitter response has been helped by the Reagan adminstration's attempt to get rid of bureaucratic red tape.

But while the "truth in used car sales" rule is an obvious target for a slashing attack aimed at its destruction, the rule would assist most of the used car industry. Consumers would buy with more confidence.

FRINGE THAT HURTS

Dishonest used car dealers are a fringe hurting the reputation of an industry that is a key part of our nation. The opportunities to sell your car make it possible to buy a new one, providing jobs in Detroit, and permit millions to own a car who couldn't afford a new one. The used car rule does nothing except combat deceptions—and that is why it is being opposed by those who don't want to have to tell you about what you are paying your hard-earned money to buy.

The honest used car dealer resents regulation in a way we all do these days, as another piece of bureaucratic interference.

But this is no more than a moderate, solidly based rule which doesn't attempt to reform the world or the economy. It simply asks for facts, and behind it are 564 pages of closely documented hearings and a five-member commission unanimous in approving it.

Right now, it seems to me that only the use car dealers, who don't want to have to tell you the truth, are saying anything. The rest of us appear numbed—or worse?

[From the Sun, Baltimore, Md., Dec. 24, 1981]

STICKER DEBATE GETS STICKY

(By Jane Bryant Quinn)

Do you, or do you not, want more information about the used cars you buy?

Americans purchased a record number of used cars last year—some 18.6 million, compared with 8.7 million new cars. Car dealers say that that trend appears to be continuing. An estimated four out of every five drivers buy a used car as their main form of transportation, mostly because new cars are too expensive.

The Federal Trade Commission has proposed that car dealers put a sticker in the window of every used car they sell, telling buyers something about the car and the conditions of sale. But Congress is threatening to veto it.

Whether Congress carries out its threat depends on your opinion of the proposed rule.

People often think a letter to a congressman or senator drops into a black hole. But that's not true. A surprisingly small number of letters can influence a vote one way or another.

So here's the story on the used-car rule. Decide what you think and let your senators and congressman know.

The FTC has determined that a lot of lies are told on used-car lots, and that they fall into two main areas:

First, a dealer may mislead you about your warranty protection. During the sales pitch he might promise to repair anything that goes wrong, or say that your warranty lasts six months. If something does go wrong, however, you may find that you actually have no warranty at all, or that your warranty lasted only 30 days, or that it doesn't cover your car's particular problem. If you don't have a dealer's promise in writing, there's nothing much you can do.

Second, the dealer might hide a car's poor mechanical condition. Certain temporary fixes can be made to engines to keep defective cars purring for short periods of time.

Originally, FTC staffers proposed that dealers be required to inspect used cars and disclose their mechanical condition. But stiff opposition from the industry eliminated mandatory inspections. As proposed, the used-car sticker would require only two disclosures: (1) Whether there's a warranty, and if so, what its terms are. (2) Whether the dealer knows of any major mechanical defects. (If you discover an undisclosed defect, the rule might strengthen your hand in suing under state law. But the rule does not give you any new legal remedies; you can only report the dealer to the FTC.)

Some car dealers support the rule. They say that the disclosure sticker is easy to fill in, that it would improve the dealer's credibility, and that it would help all the honest dealers, at the expense of the dishonest ones.

But a majority of dealers oppose the rule. They claim it's burdensome, that it's unfair to cover only car dealers and not private sales of used cars, and that the rule would effectively force them to inspect the cars they sell. (That last objection is especially discouraging. Wouldn't you have thought that any dealer would inspect a used car before pricing and selling it?)

The dealer majority, led by the National Automobile Dealers Association, has a lot of clout on Capitol Hill. Last year, car dealers were the fourth largest contributors to political campaigns. They very nearly overturned the rule last week, but Senator Robert Packwood (R, Ore.) delayed the vote until sometime next year.

When you're writing letters, you should also tell the FTC what you think of the used-car rule (write to the new chairman, James C. Miller III, FTC, Washington, D.C. 20580). Mr. Miller, a Reagan appointee, did not take part in the FTC's vote on the final rule. But indications are that the White House opposes the rule (the office of Management and Budget says it creates a paperwork burden), and it now appears that Mr. Miller will take another look at it.

The industry lobby is trying especially hard to eliminate the section saying that used-car dealers have to disclose any known defects. It is possible that the newly constituted FTC itself might rewrite the used-car rule, and in the process make it even weaker than it is today.●

DR. CALVIN O. ATCHISON

● Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, recently the Council for Advancement and Support of Education (CASE) profiled an outstanding Tennessean, Dr. Calvin O. Atchison, in its monthly publication, Case News.

Dr. Atchison is the newly elected CASE trustee-at-large for minorities and women and is a well-known Tennessee educator and civic leader.

I commend to the attention of my colleagues the work of Dr. Atchison and request that the article from Case News be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

CASE STUDY: CALVIN O. ATCHISON, DISTRICT III TRUSTEE

Newly elected CASE Trustee-at-Large for Minorities and Women Calvin O. Atchison has forged many bridges during his long career at Tennessee State University in Nashville.

"Mobility is common to many development officers," says the current TSU vice president for Research and Development, "but I have been here for 28 years. I came to my present position from the faculty ranks where I was assistant dean of the graduate school. I still hold the rank of full professor in the Department of Psychology."

A graduate of Alabama A & M with a B.S. in education, Atchison has pursued a teaching career in counseling and psychology. He also holds an M.A. in Psychological Services from Columbia University and an Ed.D. in Psychology from Indiana University.

In 1968, an accident of administrative circumstances brought Atchison to his second career at TSU—that of institutional advancement.

"The president of TSU appointed me to head up a self-study for Southern Association accreditation," he says. "The president became ill and left. A new president came in and asked me to complete the self study.

"Out of that self study came a reorganization of TSU into four sections—student services, academics, development, and business. The new president made me acting director for Development. In 1972, I became vice president for Research and Development."

Reporting to Atchison in his VP post are directors for Public Relations, Alumni Relations, Development, the TSU Foundation of which he is executive director, and an associate vice president for Federal Relations.

Atchison has held many leadership positions at the District III and the national levels of CASE.

"I first got involved at CASE when Jim Fisher asked me to serve on the National Committee for Minorities and Women," the CASE Trustee says. "From 1979 to 1981, I served as a District III board member for Minorities and Women."

Atchison has also served on the Membership Committee of District III as well as being a consultant to CASE in its Small College Programs.

Currently, he serves on three CASE Board of Trustee committees related to the national organization's goals and objectives for 1981-82. He is a member of the Committee on Fund Raising, co-chair with Joe Williams of North Carolina Agricultural and Technical State University of the Committee on Minorities, Women, and Developing Institutions, and chair of the Subcommittee on Internships of the Professional Services and Programs Committee.

"I believe one must put something into an organization to get something out of it," Atchison says in commenting on the value of CASE to his work at TSU. "Once you get to know people in an organization, that's one way of getting something out of an organization.

"Another important factor is having a president and a vice president who provide you with a budget for development programs and with an understanding of the importance of development to an institution's future growth."

Atchison sees development as a vital part of future academic strength in predominantly black colleges and universities. He also sees CASE programs and services as being vital to the growth of black professionals in the advancement field.

"With what minority institutions go through, survival depends on what development programs can do for an institution," he points out.

"Development is important because it directly relates the resources outside the institution to the programs and needs within the institution. Those who want to support an institution are not giving to the development office, but to what the institution stands for and represents."

About the future role of development in higher education, Atchison is optimistic, "I have to be optimistic or I wouldn't be playing so hard," he says. "There is need for development programs in higher education to expand. If they don't, there will be no growth in the institutions."

In addition to his work at Tennessee State University, Atchison is actively involved in the Nashville community.

"Our president believes it is very important for those of us at TSU to be an active part of our community," Atchison says. "He believes that we have a responsibility to provide volunteer services to those who can benefit from them."

At present, the CASE trustee is a member of the Board of Directors of the Nashville Housing Authority. he has also been chairman of the Human Relations Commission for Nashville, vice chairman of the local YMCA, chairman of the Meharry Mental Health Center Board of Governors, and a former member of the Board of Trustees of Martin College in Pulaski, Tennessee.

Atchison and his wife are the parents of two adopted children, a daughter who is a married college student and a son who is a seventh grader. His wife is a special education teacher of the mentally retarded in Nashville.●

U.S. POPULATION

● Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I wish to report that according to U.S. Census Bureau approximations, the total population of the United States on January 1, 1982, was 230,512,318. This represents an increase of 184,671 since December 1, 1981. Since this time last year, our population has grown by an additional 2,212,889.

In 1 short month we have added enough people to our population to fill the entire city of Grand Rapids, Mich. Over the past year, our population has increased enough to fill the city of Richmond, Va., more than 10 times.●

FISCAL NOTE LAW IS NOW A REALITY

● Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, on December 23, 1981 the President approved the State and Local Government Cost Estimate Act of 1981. This public law requires the Congressional Budget Office to prepare fiscal notes or cost estimates of the fiscal impact of new Federal legislation on State and local governments throughout the country.

In this time when the Congress will be continuing to grapple with the 1983 budget and when we will be considering the many ramifications of the administration's "new federalism" proposals, the State and Local Governments Cost Estimate Act (Public Law 97-108) is very timely and important legislation.

It is intended to give State and local governments timely and relevant information about the fiscal costs and benefits of pending Federal legislation.

I am delighted to report to my colleagues that this bill has already received favorable editorial comment and has been heartily endorsed by many prominent organizations, most notably the National Governors' Association.

Mr. President, I ask that immediately following my remarks there be printed the full text of the State and Local Government Cost Estimate Act of 1981, an editorial from the Washington Post favorably commenting on the act, and related correspondence from the National Governors' Association on Public Law 97-108.

The material follows:

RED TAPE AND PRICE TAGS

President Reagan has signed into law a requirement that Congress consider the indirect costs passed on to states and localities before it enacts federal laws. Large amounts of federal aid to state and local government carry with them a set of encumbrances worthy of the ghost of Jacob Marley.

As a result of this year's budget cutting, there is, of course, less aid to begin with, and the burden of federal rules and regulations has also been lightened somewhat. Governors and mayors aren't happy about the loss of benefits, but they'd like to see more progress toward reducing the red tape that comes with them. They would especially like Congress to abandon its practice of tacking onto federal laws requirements for states and localities to do things with their own money that the federal government wasn't willing to pay for itself.

Most of these requirements are easy to defend as being in the public interest for humanitarian, health, cultural or other reasons. The handicapped ought to have access to public facilities, non-English speaking children should be educated, historic sites should be protected and no one should dump his raw sewage into the nearest stream. Many of these objectives, however, carry very big price tags. This was especially true when Congress also stipulated that the objective be met in a closely prescribed fashion—bilingual education or wheelchair lifts on all public buses, for example—without regard to differences in local needs and resources.

The new law won't prevent Congress from legislating unpaid costs for states and localities, and it won't repeal those already in law. It requires only that the Congressional Budget Office prepare an estimate of the direct and indirect costs of any federal legislation that is expected to impose a significant burden on all states and localities or those in a particular region. This, however, should make Congress do what it didn't do when some of the most expensive rules slipped into law—stop and think about how the costs of what it is doing should be balanced against all the other claims on government at every level.

NATIONAL GOVERNORS' ASSOCIATION,
January 29, 1982.

Hon. JIM SASSER,
Russell Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR SASSER: Before becoming immersed in the issues facing the second session of the 97th Congress, we wanted to thank you for your leadership during the first session in achieving enactment of the State and Local Government Cost Estimate Act of 1981. As you know, the bill was a top priority of the National Governors' Association, and we consider its final passage a major advancement in the field of public policy. Successful action on the bill would not have been possible without the concern and hard work of you and your staff, and we very much appreciate all that you did.

We look forward to working with you in the future to ensure that the provisions of the bill are implemented as soon as possible and to resolve other issues of mutual concern.

Sincerely,

RICHARD A. SNELLING,
Governor,
RICHARD W. RILEY,
Governor.●

UNCONTROLLED ILLEGAL IMMIGRATION

● Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I have just returned from a trip to Florida. While I was there, I was able to observe once again the continuing effects uncontrolled illegal immigration has had on my State. It has been over a year and a half since the Mariel boat lift began in April of 1980, and still this country does not have an effective immigration policy.

We have failed to respond to the needs of the people of south Florida as illegal immigration continues unabated. As we begin the second session of the 97th Congress, I believe that it is appropriate to recount the steps that have been taken to address this crisis and to consider what additional action must be forthcoming if we are to regain control of immigration to this country.

As a Floridian, I am outraged over the illegal immigration crisis that has disrupted south Florida for nearly 2 years. State and local governments have struggled to provide make-shift solutions for the social chaos while waiting for the Federal Government to take decisive action.

Education and public health services have been strained beyond their capacity. The people of Florida have been victimized by the criminal element of the refugee population. Illegal immigration is a national problem and it is a Federal responsibility. One State alone cannot and should not bear the consequences of Federal inaction, especially when that, or any, State is powerless to control illegal immigration. It is past time for the Federal Government to remember south Florida.

Two administrations have failed to provide adequate assistance to the State. Former President Carter's open arms policy initially encouraged the illegal mass migration of refugees. I opposed that policy publicly and privately. Although I was sympathetic to the desires of Cuban/Americans for family reunification, I could not support allowing the refugees to come on Castro's terms, without documentation or screening.

The illegal entry of refugees has continued as thousands of undocumented Haitian refugees have flooded our shores. They come seeking refuge in the United States rather than life in Haiti, the poorest country in the Western Hemisphere.

While I understand their search for a better way of life, I oppose allowing them to enter illegally, outside prescribed immigration channels. The Immigration and Naturalization Service has been prevented by a Federal court order from hearing asylum cases involving Haitians but there are steps which can be taken to aid Florida.

We must begin by stopping the flow of immigrants from the Caribbean. On October 2, 1981, the President ordered the Coast Guard to intercept boats suspected of carrying illegal immigrants from Haiti and to return the immigrants to their homeland. I support this interdiction policy.

My only regret is that it was not put into place sooner. The number of Haitians entering the country illegally declined from 555 in September to 48 in November. Had interdiction been used earlier, much of the crisis in Florida could have been avoided.

In order to further discourage illegal immigration, I sponsored an amendment, which was adopted as a part of the foreign assistance bill, and is now law. That amendment makes all U.S. economic development aid to Haiti contingent upon that country's cooperation in halting the illegal emigration of its people. The new law allows aid to Haiti only if the President determines that the Haitian Government is not encouraging illegal emigration and is actively assisting the United States in curbing illegal Haitian emigration.

In addition, U.S. development aid must be used to develop the Haitian economy to relieve the pressing poverty of that country. Early indications are that interdiction, in combination with this change in our foreign assistance program, will have a significant impact on the influx of illegal immigrants. However, a number of problems still remain.

Opening a second holding center for illegal aliens outside the State is a step which should be taken immediately. Overcrowded and unsanitary, the Krome Avenue Processing Center stands as an indictment of the Federal Government's inability to respond to the crisis.

The conditions at Krome are a danger to the refugees who are housed there as well as to the residents of south Florida. Despite the deplorable conditions, the administration has been unable to locate another site for processing refugees outside the State of Florida. I sponsored an amendment to the Justice Department appropriations bill to limit the population of Krome to 525 persons, in order to force the administration to move refugees to another location by March 1, 1982.

Although work on the appropriations bill has not been completed, an amendment was added to the continuing resolution requiring the Federal Government to seek another holding center as quickly as possible.

As far as I am concerned, part of the Federal Government's responsibility includes providing money to Florida's State and local governments whose resources—schools, hospitals, and police—have been stretched beyond the breaking point by the numbers of immigrants.

Last year, through my positions on the Senate Budget and Appropriations Committees, I was able to obtain $100 million in Federal assistance to help Florida meet the extraordinary costs of the crisis as well as $250 million for the Coast Guard and Immigration and Naturalization Service to cover the cost processing and reception centers.

This year, I have been dismayed by the administration's efforts to reduce the funding that Congress earmarked for assistance to Florida. Although Congress largely rejected the administration's proposed budget cuts in this area, it will take a sustained effort to protect funding for Florida.

The latest assault has come in the form of proposed revisions in the domestic assistance program for refugees and entrants by the Department of Health and Human Services. Refugee cash and medical assistance is the Federal benefit available to refugees who do not qualify for ordinary Federal assistance programs, such as aid to families with dependent children (AFDC) and supplemental security income (SSI).

Over 20 percent of the Cuban and Haitian refugees are receiving this special benefit which was scheduled to be available for 3 years. Secretary Schweiker has proposed reducing the Federal program to 18 months, dumping thousands of current recipients on the Dade County Welfare Department.

Although some Federal reimbursement will be available to the county, it is already apparent that it will be far less than is needed. I oppose this change in policy and have joined with my colleagues in the Florida congressional delegation in a letter to Secretary Schweiker requesting that the changes be delayed until Congress has an opportunity to review the matter.

I feel strongly that Florida's taxpayers should not bear the costs for a situation they did not create. If the local governments are forced to assume the principal responsibility for refugee assistance I will work to make certain that impact aid grants are made available and that they are of a sufficient amount to reimburse county governments for their expense.

The administration has also sought to reduce the funding for the Immigration and Naturalization Service, the agency responsible for patrolling our borders and enforcing our immigration laws, in the midst of the most serious immigration crisis our country has known.

In his budget proposals for 1982, President Reagan requested a $14,834,000 cut in the INS budget. This would have resulted in a loss of 1,170 INS agents. I sponsored an amendment to the Justice Department authorization bill to restore $14,301,000 to the INS budget.

Shortly thereafter, the adminstration acted independently to restore INS funding, and, needless to say, I was delighted to see that shift.

But in November, during the second round of budget cuts, it again reversed itself and requested a 6-percent reduction in the INS budget. I again opposed the proposed cuts. To me this was a foolhardy action which would have demonstrated to other nations that the United States is not serious about controlling immigration. I was prepared to filibuster the continuing resolution if necessary to block the cuts.

Fortunately, many of my colleagues also opposed the cuts and they were withdrawn. The continuing resolution passed without reducing the appropriation for the agency.

The criminals who came among the Mariel refugees are perhaps the most disturbing aspect of the crisis. INS estimates that only 1 percent of the Cuban refugees had criminal records. Those refugees who committed serious crimes, such as rape and murder, have been detained in the Federal penitentiary in Atlanta.

But there is no way to be certain of the precise number of criminals who came. Law enforcement officers can attest to the rise in crime that Florida experienced after the Mariel boatlift.

Unfortunately, the activities of a few have unfairly given a bad name to the entire Cuban community. Unless we are successful in pursuing vigorous law enforcement efforts, the effects of the criminals will last long after the other facets of the refugee crisis have passed.

The refugees who are convicted of committing felonies in this country should be deported in accordance with our immigration laws along with those who have been detained for their crimes in Cuba. I urge the administration to press with the Cuban Government for the unconditional repatriation of the Cuban criminals with the Cuban Government.

I was delighted with the administration's decision to form a special blue ribbon task force, chaired by Vice President BUSH, to focus on the problems of crime, drugs, and immigration in south Florida. This special task force can work with the Florida congressional delegation and with concerned citizen groups to help relieve the crime crisis in south Florida.

This task force will help focus attention on the seriousness of the immigration situation in south Florida. That in turn, should enable us to better coordinate the Federal Government's efforts, and help assure that we have the resources and the people we need to deal with this crisis and with the crime crisis. I stand ready to work with this task force, and to assist it in whatever way I can.

The root cause of the current situation is that our Nation does not have an immigration policy. It will take numerous legislative reforms to strengthen our immigration laws so that this kind of crisis can be prevented in the future.

Mr. President, I have joined with Senator HUDDLESTON in introducing S. 776, the Immigration and National Security Act, which is a comprehensive immigration reform package. The bill addresses the most serious and pressing inadequacies of our current immigration laws.

First, the bill sets a strict cap of 350,000 on the number of immigrants and refugees that can be accepted to the United States each year. Our current quota can be stretched like a rubber band. Although the official limit was 270,000 in 1980, at least 800,000 immigrants and refugees entered that year.

In order to exceed the limit provided in S. 776, the President would have to borrow from the next year's quota, reducing the number of immigrants who could come the following year. This gives the President the authority to respond to an emergency abroad, while guaranteeing that our yearly average will not exceed 350,000.

S. 776 also seeks to eliminate the magnet of American jobs which draws illegal aliens to this country by making it a crime for U.S. employers to hire an illegal alien. In conjunction, the bill calls for increased border patrol by INS to help prevent illegal immigration.

Finally, the bill expedites the processing of applications for asylum so that we can avoid the lengthy administrative delays that have plagued U.S. response to the Haitian influx.

Applicants for political asylum are eligible for a lengthy appeals procedure if their application is denied by INS. As we have seen, asylum cases can be tied up in the courts for years. My bill will streamline the appeals procedure and prevent lawyers from abusing it.

Frankly, it does not make sense that aliens who arrive in this country illegally should acquire the full package of rights and privileges available to our own citizens simply because they are within our borders.

Under existing circumstances, illegal immigrants are able to obtain federally subsidized legal representation to fend off deportation. I have introduced an amendment to the Justice Department appropriations bill which prohibits Federal money from being used to represent illegal aliens.

I hope that this restrictive language will be included when the Senate considers the Justice Department appropriation for the remainder of 1982.

Senator THURMOND has also introduced a major immigration reform bill on behalf of the administration and I understand that Senator SIMPSON, the chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on Immigration and Refugee Policy is preparing legislation of his own in this area.

I welcome these bills. I believe they demonstrate bipartisan recognition of the serious problems facing this Nation if we do not regain control of immigration.

Mr. President, our country has a proud tradition of welcoming immigrants and refugees but events of the past year and a half have clearly demonstrated that our country cannot absorb unlimited numbers of people without creating economic and social problems for our own citizens.

U.S. immigration laws are the most generous in the world. We cannot continue to allow illegal immigration to undermine the credibility of those laws. We must return to a position where we, not other nations, regulate the flow of immigrants and refugees to this country. Getting control of immigration and providing assistance to the State of Florida remain a top priority with me and must be a top priority of the 97th Congress during this second session.●

MALCOLM MOOS

● Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, it is with regret and great personal respect that I rise today to pay tribute to a remarkable man. Malcolm Moos—"Mac" to most who knew him—passed away last week at the age of 65 at his home in northern Minnesota that he loved so much.

Mac Moos was a teacher. His field was political science, and he held teaching positions at the University of Minnesota, UCLA, the University of Alabama, the University of Wyoming, Johns Hopkins University, the University of Michigan, and Columbia University.

Mac was also a writer and editor. He worked with H. L. Mencken at the Baltimore Sun, and he spent 4 years in the White House as a writer and assistant to President Dwight D. Eisenhower.

He was also an educational administrator and planner, serving as director in the Ford Foundation, president of the University of Minnesota for 7 years, and president of the Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions. Most recently, he directed a comprehensive study of higher education in the State of Maryland, the report of which was just recently released.

When Mac Moos came back to the University of Minnesota to become its president in 1967, he came to a university at the height of its growing pains, like so many other institutions grappling with burgeoning enrollment demands and confronted with confrontation. New demands from new clienteles were being heard on the campus, and the activism of the Vietnam era was just emerging. The previously quiet daily demonstrations, and many of those new experiences that threatened the confidence in our universities that we had almost come to take for granted.

As assistant to Gov. Harold LeVander, I was in a position to see firsthand those new pressures and what they could do to my alma mater. As many of my colleagues know from their own experience, those were the days when we kept the phone lines open, wondering whether it would become necessary to call in National Guard or police units, and I think we all can remember how fragile the campus situations were. Folks on all sides were calling for more strident notions, and some of us were fortunate enough to be able to rely on cooler, reasoned voices in the key positions.

Mac's was such a voice. Minnesota survived those years. We had some tense moments, when tempers did get out of hand. But throughout it all we maintained freedom of expression, and out of the confrontations came reasoned appropriate change. A great university adapted to its new demands without compromising its values. I credit Mac Moos and the skilled people he chose for his management team for making that possible.

Years later, when Mac was asked how he wanted to be remembered, he said:

> I would like to be remembered as a person committed to the rule of reason who resisted, as best he could, the volcano of violence that erupted on our campuses and in our society in the last decade.

That wish has been granted, since many Minnesotans remember him in that way.

Mac did not mention wanting to be remembered as a wordsmith, but I will remember him as a writer and speaker who loved the language. With one figure of speech or one turn of a phrase, he could make memorable an otherwise ponderous draft produced by a staff member. I assume many of my Senate colleagues must share my envy of anyone who can do that.

In some respects, it may well be skill with words for which Mac will be remembered. When he came to Minnesota, the one thing we all knew was that this new university president had worked with President Eisenhower and had somehow been involved in the speechwriting team that developed Ike's farewell address to the American people—the speech we all remember encapsulated in one new term, the "military-industrial complex."

When I was thinking about what to say about Malcolm Moos, I already knew about his wish to be remembered as a man of reason and, of course, I remembered the wordsmithing of the "military-industrial complex." That term is all I could remember of that farewell address, though, so I asked for a copy from the library to see whether it included both good writing and well-reasoned discourse.

Mr. President, what I found was a remarkably timely statement and a carefully reasoned commentary on the issues facing America. I had planned to pull out a few quotations to enter in the RECORD as tribute to Mac, and I found that the better tribute to him and to his belief in reason would be to enter the entire address. I know many of us remember this speech for its one, compelling phrase, but it offers so much more, and I commend it to my colleagues for careful reading. It says much we need to hear these days about the proper role of American Government.

Mr. President, I include the "Farewell Radio and Television Address to the American People" by President Dwight D. Eisenhower in today's RECORD.

The material follows:

FAREWELL RADIO AND TELEVISION ADDRESS TO THE AMERICAN PEOPLE—JANUARY 17, 1961

[Delivered from the President's Office at 8:30 p.m.]

My fellow Americans, three days from now, after half a century in the service of our country, I shall lay down the responsibilities of office as, in traditional and solemn ceremony, the authority of the Presidency is vested in my successor.

This evening I come to you with a message of leave-taking and farewell, and to share a few final thoughts with you, my countrymen.

Like every other citizen, I wish the New President, and all who will labor with him, Godspeed. I pray that the coming years will be blessed with peace and prosperity for all.

Our people expect their President and the Congress to find essential agreement on issues of great moment, the wise resolution of which will better shape the future of the Nation.

My own relations with the Congress, which began on a remote and tenuous basis when, long ago, a member of the Senate appointed me to West Point, have since ranged to the intimate during the war and immediate post-war period, and, finally, to the mutually interdependent during these past eight years.

In this final relationship, the Congress and the Administration have, on most vital issues, cooperated well, to serve the national good rather than mere partisanship, and so have assured that the business of the Nation should go forward. So, my official relationship with the Congress ends in a feeling, on my part, of gratitude that we have been able to do so much together.

We now stand ten years past the midpoint of a century that has witnessed four major wars among great nations. Three of these involved our own country. Despite these holocausts America is today the strongest, the most influential and most productive nation in the world. Understandably proud of this pre-eminence, we yet realize that America's leadership and prestige depend, not merely upon our unmatched material progress, riches and military strength, but on how we use our power in the interests of world peace and human betterment.

Throughout America's adventure in free government, our basic purposes have been to keep the peace; to foster progress in human achievement, and to enhance liberty, dignity and integrity among people and among nations. To strive for less would be unworthy of a free and religious people. Any failure traceable to arrogance, or our lack of comprehension or readiness to sacrifice would inflict upon us grievous hurt both at home and abroad.

Progress toward these noble goals is persistently threatened by the conflict now engulfing the world. It commands our whole attention, absorbs our very beings. We face a hostile ideology—global in scope, atheistic in character, ruthless in purpose, and insidious in method. Unhappily the danger it poses promises to be of indefinite duration. To meet it succesfully, there is called for, not so much the emotional and transitory sacrifices of crisis, but rather those which enable us to carry forward steadily, surely, and without complaint the burdens of a prolonged and complex struggle—with liberty the stake. Only thus shall we remain, despite every provocation, on our charted course toward permanent peace and human betterment.

Crises there will continue to be. In meeting them, whether foreign or domestic, great or small, there is a recurring temptation to feel that some spectacular and costly action could become the miraculous solution to all current difficulties. A huge increase in newer elements of our defense; development of unrealistic programs to cure every ill in agriculture; a dramatic expansion in basic and applied research—these and many other possibilities, each possibly promising in itself, may be suggested as the only way to the road we wish to travel.

But each proposal must be weighed in the light of a broader consideration: the need to maintain balance in and among national programs—balance between the private and the public economy, balance between cost and hoped for advantage—balance between the clearly necessary and the comfortably desirable; balance between our essential requirements as a nation and the duties imposed by the nation upon the individual; balance between actions of the moment and the national welfare of the future. Good judgment seeks balance and progress; lack of it eventually finds imbalance and frustration.

The record of many decades stands as proof that our people and their government have, in the main, understood these truths and have responded to them well, in the face of stress and threat. But threats, new in kind or degree, constantly arise. I mention two only.

IV.

A vital element in keeping the peace is our military establishment. Our arms must be mighty, ready for instant action, so that no potential aggressor may be tempted to risk his own destruction.

Our military organization today bears little relation to that known by any of my predecessors in peacetime, or indeed by the fighting men of World War II or Korea.

Until the latest of our world conflicts, the United States had no armaments industry. American makers of plowshares could, with time and as required, make swords as well. But now we can no longer risk emergency improvisation of national defense; we have been compelled to create a permanent armaments industry of vast proportions. Added to this, three and a half million men and women are directly engaged in the defense establishment. We annually spend on military security more than the net income of all United States corporations.

This conjunction of an immense military establishment and a large arms industry is new in the American experience. The total influence—economic, political, even spiritual—is felt in every city, every State house, every office of the Federal government. We recognize the imperative need for this development. Yet we must not fail to comprehend its grave implications. Our toil, resources and livelihood are all involved; so is the very structure of our society.

In the councils of government, we must guard against the acquisition of unwarranted influence, whether sought or unsought, by the military-industrial complex. The potential for the disastrous rise of misplaced power exists and will persist.

We must never let the weight of this combination endanger our liberties or democratic processes. We should take nothing for granted. Only an alert and knowledgeable citizenry can compel the proper meshing of the huge industrial and military machinery of defense with our peaceful methods and goals, so that security and liberty may prosper together.

Akin to, and largely responsible for the sweeping changes in our industrial-military posture, has been the technological revolution during recent decades.

In this revolution, research has become central; it also becomes more formalized, complex, and costly. A steadily increasing share is conducted for, by, or at the direction of, the Federal government.

Today, the solitary inventor, tinkering in his shop, has been overshadowed by task forces of scientists in laboratories and testing fields. In the same fashion, the free university, historically the fountainhead of free ideas and scientific discovery, has experienced a revolution in the conduct of research. Partly because of the huge costs involved, a government contract becomes virtually a substitute for intellectual curiosity. For every old blackboard there are now hundreds of new electronic computers.

The prospect of domination of the nation's scholars by Federal employment, project allocations, and the power of money is ever present—and is gravely to be regarded.

Yet, in holding scientific research and discovery in respect, as we should, we must also be alert to the equal and opposite danger that public policy could itself become the captive of a scientific-technological elite.

It is the task of statesmanship to mold, to balance, and to integrate these and other forces, new and old, within the principles of our democratic system—ever aiming toward the supreme goals of our free society.

V.

Another factor in maintaining balance involves the element of time. As we peer into society's future, we—you and I, and our government—must avoid the impulse to live only for today, plundering, for our own ease and convenience, the precious resources of tomorrow. We cannot mortgage the material assets of our grandchildren without risking the loss also of their political and spiritual heritage. We want democracy to survive for all generations to come, not to become the insolvent phantom of tomorrow.

Down the long lane of the history yet to be written America knows that this world of ours, ever growing smaller, must avoid becoming a community of dreadful fear and hate, and be, instead, a proud confederation of mutual trust and respect.

Such a confederation must be one of equals. The weakest must come to the conference table with the same confidence as do we, protected as we are by our moral, economic, and military strength. That table, though scarred by many past frustrations, cannot be abandoned for the certain agony of the battlefield.

Disarmament, with mutual honor and confidence, is a continuing imperative. Together we must learn how to compose differences, not with arms, but with intellect and decent purpose. Because this need is so sharp and apparent I confess that I lay down my official responsibilities in this field with a definite sense of disappointment. As one who has witnessed the horror and the lingering sadness of war—as one who knows that another war could utterly destroy this civilization which has been so slowly and painfully built over thousands of years—I wish I could say tonight that a lasting peace is in sight.

Happily, I can say that war has been avoided. Steady progress toward our ultimate goal has been made. But, so much remains to be done. As a private citizen, I shall never cease to do what little I can to help the world advance along that road.

VII.

So—in this my last good night to you as your President—I thank you for the many opportunities you have given me for public service in war and peace. I trust that in that service you find some things worthy; as for the rest of it, I know you will find ways to improve performance in the future.

You and I—my fellow citizens—need to be strong in our faith that all nations, under God, will reach the goal of peace with justice. May we be ever unswerving in devotion to principle, confident but humble with power, diligent in pursuit of the Nation's great goals.

To all the peoples of the world, I once more give expression to America's prayerful and continuing aspiration:

We pray that peoples of all faiths, all races, all nations, may have their great human needs satisfied; that those now denied opportunity shall come to enjoy it to the full; that all who yearn for freedom may experience its spiritual blessings; that those who have freedom will understand, also, its heavy responsibilities; that all who are insensitive to the needs of others will learn charity; that the scourges of poverty, disease and ignorance will be made to disappear from the earth, and that, in the goodness of time, all peoples will come to live together in a peace guaranteed by the binding force of mutual respect and love.●

SENATOR CRANSTON ON EAST/WEST RELATIONS

● Mr. DODD. Mr. President, this morning when Secretary of State Haig appeared before the Foreign Relations Committee, my distinguished colleague, the senior Senator from California, delivered an opening statement on East/West relations.

Because of the vital importance of this subject, I believe my colleagues will be very interested in Senator CRANSTON's insightful critique of the Reagan administration's approach to East/West relations. I have therefore taken the liberty of submitting his remarks for the RECORD.

Senator CRANSTON's remarks follow:

OPENING STATEMENT OF SENATOR ALAN CRANSTON, SENATE FOREIGN RELATIONS COMMITTEE HEARING ON EAST-WEST RELATIONS

I welcome this opportunity to learn more from Secretary Haig regarding the vital relations between the United States and the Soviet Union.

Throughout the first year of the Reagan Administration, I have shared the alarm with which so many Americans have viewed the President's proclivity for approaching all global issues on East-West terms, while ignoring regional sources of international tensions.

I believe this simplistic view has done real harm to our security interests as the Administration has pursued policies abroad which have time and again placed us in conflict with our allies.

I share the abhorrence that most Americans feel at the Soviets' continued campaigns of aggression in Afghanistan and Southeast Asia, their pressures on Poland, and their disregard for human rights guarantees provided in the Helsinki accords. I went to Moscow last fall with Senator Mathias, in part, to convey these American concerns.

But I reject the type of "total linkage" theories which President Reagan has periodically embraced.

I believe it is a serious failure that fifteen months after his election, President Reagan still has not come forward with a position on the number one issue of our time, strategic nuclear arms control.

The few times that the President has publicly discussed this subject, he has displayed a provocative naivete which has made America appear belligerent in the vital competition for international support. The one exception to this sorry record—the carefully crafted November speech on European missile deployments—was produced for the President only after sustained international protests threatened the fabric of the Atlantic Alliance. Fifteen months of strident Administration rhetoric have led to the damaging and absurd situation where the United States, not the Soviet Union, has been placed on the defensive in the international competition for support from the peoples of the world.

I recognize that this Administration has its extremists and its moderates, its professionals and its amateurs in the field of foreign policy. And I wish to pay tribute this morning to the professionalism with which most State Department officials—including you, Mr. Secretary—have approached the critical issues of east-west relations.

A September 1981 Gallup poll found that 68 percent of the American people fear an all-out war with the Soviet Union this decade. I believe we can prevent such a catastrophe and advance our national security interests if intelligent American leadership is provided. I know we must do so.

I believe that despite the fundamental differences which divide our two societies, the United States and Soviet Union can press forward in pursuit of our mutual interest in curbing the mindless growth of our nuclear overkill capabilities. And we can reduce the terrible burden which the Reagan arms race policies place upon our strained, sputtering economy.

I believe we can avoid having to choose between capitulation and nuclear confrontation and holocaust.

I believe President Reagan has failed to establish the basis for producing balanced, verifiable arms reductions. By reviving a late-1940's version of containment and by encouraging anti-Soviet hysteria, the President has harmed not only the prospects for meaningful arms control, but also our relations with allies, our economy and the cause of peace in general.

It is time to get on with the task of advancing America's twin interests in security and peace in a more balanced fashion.

Time is too precious and the threat of nuclear holocaust is too real to delay.

So I welcome the appearance of Secretary Haig this morning. And I look forward to hearing more about the Reagan Administration's hope and plans for the future of East-West relations.●

A SUPPLY-SIDER ARGUES FOR THE GOLD STANDARD

● Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, it is important that the record in support of the gold standard—which is becoming quite large—continue to receive the attention it deserves in Congress.

I ran across an article in the December 7 Business Week magazine entitled "A Supply-Side Case for a Gold Standard," by Mr. Jude Wanniski, who makes some excellent arguments which should help convince all but the most skeptical or cynical.

Mr. President, I ask that the article by Mr. Wanniski be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

A SUPPLY-SIDE CASE FOR A GOLD STANDARD

The entire world, Communist as well as capitalist, has been led into recession and the path of a gathering financial storm by obsolete U.S. monetary policy. Only the careful use of gold through a particular kind of gold standard can now prevent a U.S.-led world depression. This is an absolutely necessary condition, along with the tax-rate reductions already in place, for noninflationary economic growth in 1982 and beyond.

Without gold, the Federal Reserve is helpless. With the dollar floating, it is not possible for Paul Volcker to know the supply of money in the economy or the demand for it. The idea that he can somehow control that which he cannot know is the basis of the monetarist experiment that has undermined the people's faith in our currency.

There are many kinds of gold standards that have appeared over the centuries and are discussed today. The supply siders reject most varieties as obsolete. And there is a desire to build on the wisdom of the past and the useful experience of the last decade in designing a modern system that will last for at least 50 years.

In this spirit, we discard the various gold "cover" standards that rely on quantities of gold as a way of forcing discipline on the monetary authorities. To help match the supply of money to its demand, the supply siders have always viewed gold as a communications instrument. Those economists who view gold as being unworthy because it is unscientific fail to appreciate this aspect of convertibility. It is the convertibility school that attracts the supply siders. It is convertibility that enables the marketplace to communicate its needs to the central bank.

The bank is guided in its purchases or sales of securities in the open market by the marginal changes in the public's demand for currency as observed at the gold window. The Fed now has no such guidance, nor was it guided from 1968 to 1971. In that period, although the gold window was open, Presidents Johnson and Nixon pleaded with our allies and trading partners not to show up at the gold window. Thus jammed, the mechanism blew up.

MAINTAINING THE DOLLAR

The particular kind of gold standard envisioned by supply siders would correct this flaw, making the dollar convertible by people as well as by central banks. The rebuilt mechanism could not be jammed. There is only one job for this mechanism, the maintenance of the dollar as a standard of value. There is almost nothing the government can provide the market-place that is more important than a reliable unit of account. This does not require vast hoards of gold. It requires only the market's confidence that the government understands this singular role of money. As long as people know the government does not intend to devalue the paper dollar relative to gold, they will not ask for gold.

Restoration of the dollar as a reliable international standard of value would immediately collapse interest rates in dollar assets, and in all currencies that join the system. This is because governments would once again be shouldering the risk of their own currencies, a risk now borne by private transactors that comprise the largest part of the price of credit. As BUSINESS WEEK observed in its ground-breaking story on the gold standard (Sept. 21, 1981), a gold scenario would not only bring falling interest rates but also a strengthening dollar on the foreign exchange markets. This is the only scenario that yields these positive movements in combination.

Professor Robert Mundell, a Canadian now at Columbia University, would initiate the process by having the U.S. Treasury stabilize the dollar price of gold within a broad band, perhaps $400 to $450. Jelle Zijlstra, chairman of the Bank for International Settlements, made a similar proposal at the International Monetary Fund meeting in September.

The key concern among all supply siders is that the price should not fall below the nominal wage rate, which would put pressure on organized labor. Erring on the high side is preferable.

FINDING A RATIO

Mundell's band of $400 to $450 at least seems to meet these conditions. And he acknowledges that the final dollar-gold ratio—which would take a year or so to discover—could well be lower or higher. The process of discovery would involve America's trading partners, who would participate every step of the way in reconstructing the international monetary system.

Based on my assumption that what the people of the world need most of all is a reliable unit of account, I believe the setting of a price is more important than the price itself. That is, global commerce and the general welfare would expand at any restored convertibility rate betweeen, say, $250 and $650. Beyond those points there would be the risk of excessive turbulence, debtors being strained at the lower end, and creditors hurt at the upper end.

How would the new system work when completed? And why would it survive when Bretton Woods did not?

As in Bretton Woods, the U.S. would commit itself to maintaining the dollar-gold ratio by buying and selling gold around the narrow band ultimately discovered at, say, $425 (buying at $420 and selling at $430). Our trading partners would link to the system by fixing their currencies to the dollar, which is an indirect way of fixing to gold, or directly monetizing gold.

Convertibility would be universal. Anyone with dollars could convert to gold at the gold window, which would prevent the monetary or political authority in the U.S. from jamming the system. The average citizen can be trusted to ignore any pleas not to present dollars for gold, which will immediately dissuade authorities from attempting to push excess "liquidity" into the economy.

The Bretton Woods system broke down, after all, because of a belief that the terms of trade could be changed between nations or individuals by changing the unit of account. But we should have relearned in the 1970s, that this is impossible. If a loaf of bread exchanges for a bottle of milk when the unit of account is 50¢, the terms remain the same at $1 or $10.

What makes the system work is the acceptance of the idea that the unit of account need never change. Strictly speaking, currencies can never be "undervalued" or "overvalued" because like a yardstick, or an ounce, the currency unit is a fixed standard of measure. Any change is harmful to those who use it.

Wesley Clair Mitchell, who was Arthur Burns's teacher, emphatically made this point in 1903, when he demonstrated that the issuance of greenbacks in the Civil War added more to debt service than it saved by not issuing bonds.

"The resort to a legal-tender paper currency," wrote Mitchell, "is a confession of acute financial distress and as such must depress the market for bonds. Therefore, to the financial loss caused by the increase of expenditures should be added a second loss from the unfavorable terms to which the government had to submit in selling its securities." Modern greenbacks have the same effect.

SAVINGS ON DEBT SERVICE

It was this concept the supply siders could never seem to impress on David Stockman, that the path to a balanced budget is paved with gold. Being able to refinance the trillion-dollar national debt at low interest rates would bring enormous economies to debt service costs. Instead, Stockman embraced the ideas of Alan Greenspan, William Simon, Henry Kaufman, et al, and attacked the deficit directly as a means of solving inflation and interest rates. This baffled the supply siders from the outset, because Stockman had participated, with me and Jeffrey Bell, in writing the monetary plank in the Republican platform:

"Ultimately, inflation is a decline in the value of the dollar, the monetary standard, in terms of the goods it can buy. Until the decade of the 1970s, monetary policy was automatically linked to the overriding objective of maintaining a stable dollar value. The severing of the dollar's link with real commodities in the 1960s and 1970s to pursue economic goals other than dollar stability has unleashed hyperinflationary forces at home and monetary disorder abroad, without bringing any of the desired benefits. One of the most urgent tasks in the period ahead will be the restoration of a dependable monetary standard, that is, an end to inflation."

Greenspan particularly sold Stockman on the notion that a gold standard could only come as a capstone to the fiscal fight against inflation. This view reflects Greenspan's wholly separate objective, which is to eliminate the welfare state.

What neither Greenspan nor Stockman has ever been able to see is that the explosion of the "social pork barrel," as Stockman calls it, has coincided with the manipulation of the currency, the repeated inducements of recession via fiscal means to combat inflation.

They have, when pressed, argued that the reopening of the gold window would cause "a liquidity crisis." But that itself is a fallacious demand-side view of things. A gold standard doesn't limit the money supply any more than a yardstick standard limits the number of yardsticks. A convertible dollar would invite lending, lending long, which halts the wave of bankruptcies by enabling households, companies, and Third World nations to lengthen the maturity of their debts.

In the system envisioned, it isn't necessary for the government to hold much gold at all. As Robert Hall of the National Bureau of Economic Research explains, the substantive effect of the classical gold standard "came from the legal definition of the dollar, not the government's control of the money stock. Essentially the same control of prices could have been achieved just from the definition of legal tender, without any control of the private creation of money."

THE IRRELEVANT ARGUMENT

The argument, then, that there is "too little gold," or that the Soviet Union and South Africa "control the gold supply and thus our monetary system," is irrelevant. The supply siders are not even interested in a system that ties the dollar to a quantity rule. If the government can maintain the quality of our dollar, it maintains the quality for all dollars.

The key thing to realize is that if it chooses to do so, the U.S. can absolutely control the dollar price of gold, and in this manner stabilize the general price level and the value of all dollar contracts. The Russians can only control the ruble price of gold, the South Africans, the rand price. Relative prices can change around the gold value, as the earth yields more or less gold, or as personal tastes alter relative values. But the one constant unit of account eliminates entirely windfall losses and windfall gains among debtors and creditors. Debtors pay what was promised, creditors receive what was pledged. Once again, people will lend long-term at low interest rates.

All it really takes to get things started and benefits flowing is a telephone call from President Reagan to Treasury Secretary Regan to initiate the Mundell-Zijlstra proposal. The supply siders are confident this telephone call will be made, and made fairly soon, as the recession deepens and the President realizes the only alternative to gold is "reflation," which means another upward loop in the inflationary spiral.

The President, who happens to be the staunchest supporter of a gold standard in his Administration, will at that point be able to survey his Cabinet and ask: "Are there any other reasons why we shouldn't try gold?" And hearing none, he will throw out the golden anchor and stop the steep slide of the economy, his popularity, and the Republican Party. Nothing else will work.●

TRIBUTE TO ADMIRAL RICKOVER

● Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, at midnight on January 31, the forced retirement of Adm. Hyman G. Rickover became effective, thereby bringing to an end one of the most brilliant military careers in the Nation's history.

Admiral Rickover brought to the nuclear Navy an uncompromising devotion to excellence. His standards drew to his programs the finest officers and crews. The rigorous demands he placed upon those who made it through his famous selection process had one objective—to make our best truly incomparable.

He succeeded. There is no more impressive credential in the Navy than the simple statement "I served under Rickover."

Today, the Navy's nuclear fleet comprises 161 vessels. And never, Mr. President, has there been a single accident associated with their nuclear reactors. "One would wish," said one observer, "that his influence in the civilian nuclear power industry had been greater—Rickover-trained people don't turn the wrong valves the way they did at Three Mile Island."

One would also wish that Admiral Rickover's influence on procurement had been greater within the Department of Defense. "I treat the government's money as if it were my own," Admiral Rickover has said. And he has vividly described what happens when defense contractors know that they can always count upon the Pentagon to save them from the consequences of their own bad management:

Large defense contractors can let costs come where they will and count on getting relief from the DOD through changes and claims, relaxation of procurement regulations and laws . . . or other escape mechanisms . . . they will make their money whether their price is fair or higher than it should be; whether delivery is on time or late.

With Admiral Rickover in charge, the Navy's contractors knew that they had a hard taskmaster.

Admiral Rickover demanded quality construction.

He demanded on-time performance.

He demanded a dollar's worth of value for each and every taxpayer dollar expended.

And because he demanded these things, he made powerful enemies, who mounted spiteful and slanderous campaigns against him.

But Admiral Rickover's contribution went far beyond the standard of excellence he established. In terms of national security, former Navy Under Secretary James Woolsey wrote in the October 1981 issue of Armed Forces Journal International, "Try to think of another living American to whom you owe more." Mr. Woolsey wrote:

There is no Soviet skipper, anywhere in the world, who sleeps soundly in his sea cabin. He can never be sure that he isn't in the crosshairs of the periscope of one of Rickover's marvelous, quiet black attack boats. And, as we fuss with the MX and the agonizingly hard problem of fixing the vulnerability of our ICBMs, we have some breathing space because some more of Rickover's products, carrying their Poseidon and Trident missles, slip silently on patrol somewhere beneath the Atlantic and Pacific. His ships are commanded and operated by some of the most extraordinarily able and professional men you will ever meet. Their standards, and those of many of their colleagues in other parts of the Navy, have been shaped directly and indirectly by Rickover's will and perfectionism.

At the beginning of my remarks, I described Admiral Rickover as one of the towering figures in our military history. But like other great military men before him—men like Eisenhower, Marshall, and Bradley—Admiral Rickover has a deep understanding of the role and the limits of military power.

Admiral Rickover has always understood that the purpose of our forces is to insure the security of our democratic society—not the other way around.

He recently described the ships and submarines he built as "a necessary evil." "I would sink them all," he said, "if mutual disarmament could be negotiated."

He expressed fear that the world is heading for nuclear holocaust.

He called disarmament the Nation's most urgent need. Put him in charge, he suggested, and he would get results.

And in addition, this tough, dedicated military man stated categorically that "In general, we are overarming altogether."

Mr. President, I believe that it was a sad day for this country when Admiral Rickover was forced into retirement. But I am confident that he will continue to serve by speaking out with force and clarity on the vital choices that will confront us in the days to come.

I extend to Admiral Rickover my warmest best wishes and my profound gratitude for the marvels he has accomplished in the Nation's defense.●

AN APPEAL FROM THE MOTHER OF ANATOLY SHCHARANSKY

● Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, we are all too familiar with the dismal status of the emigration of Soviet Jewry and the harsh, inhumane treatment they are subjected to within the Soviet Union. Thousands upon thousands of Soviet Jews are systematically and deliberately denied internationally recognized human rights. In the West, we are acquainted with only a handful of names of those who suffer in the U.S.S.R.

Anatoly Shcharansky is one of those whose tragic personal history is fairly well known to us. The story of the courageous efforts mounted by Shcharansky to improve the respect for fundamental human freedoms in the U.S.S.R. has been told the world over. His story shows us the fortitude and commitment of the human spirit and at the same time presses us to work for worldwide recognition of the human rights set down in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the Helsinki Final Act.

The Shcharansky saga continues on a dark and distressing course. A letter from his mother, Mrs. Ida Milgrom, and an article from "Shomer Achi Anochi"—"I am my brother's keeper"—provide recent details of his struggle. I include the text of the letter and the article in the RECORD.

APPEAL FROM MRS. IDA MILGROM

In March 1977, my son Anatoly Shcharansky was arrested and accused of spying for the CIA. On July 14, 1978, the Supreme Court of the Russian Federated Socialist Republic—in a farce resembling the Dreyfus Trial—handed him a brutal, unfounded sentence of thirteen years deprived of freedom: three years in prison and ten years in forced labor camp under the most severe conditions.

At the so-called trial, my son declared that his case had been trumped up in order to crush the Jewish emigration movement in the Soviet Union. Despite blackmail and threats of capital punishment, he did not plead guilty and proclaimed that the accusations against him were absurd.

Anatoly spent three terrible years in prison and then was transferred to a forced labor camp. Acts of lawlessness and humiliation have been continuously committed against him. We have just found out that from January through October 1981, Anatoly was isolated in solitary confinement in the internal prison of the camp. Between October 1980 and October 1981, he spent 185 days in the infamous special punishment cell. Seventy-five days of this torture were given in succession. (The "kartser"—the special punishment cell is so severe that even Soviet law forbids a prisoner to be confined in it for more than 15 days at a time.)

The food ration in the internal prison of the camp is a starvation one, containing absolutely no meat or fats. In the special punishment cell, this ration is given only once in two days. In this way my son was tortured by full starvation for 93 days and by partial starvation for an equal amount of time. As a result, he became completely physically exhausted and had to be removed from prison and taken to a hospital. From the hospital, Anatoly was medically transferred directly back to the special punishment cell.

At the end of October 1981, another scene of this grotesque farce took place. Anatoly Shcharansky was put on one more trial. This one was held at the camp and took exactly five minutes. Only a procurator, a judge and two jury members were present. No lawyer participated. This so-called trial hardened the already monstrous sentence.

The "guilt" found was that my son still will not plead guilty for the crimes with which he was incriminated in the 1978 "trial."

My son is now sentenced to three more years of labor camp under the strict regime conditions described above. The repression is continuing, the humiliation is growing. They want to break my son physically and morally.

Is there any way that this world can prevent the destruction of an innocent victim of arbitrary cruelty?

IDA MILGROM.

Moscow, January 7, 1982.

SHCHARANSKY SAGA

For the first time in a year and a half, Anatoly Shcharansky's mother, Mrs. Ida Milgrom, and brother Leonid were permitted to visit him in the Chistopol Prison in Tataria, USSR.

Anatoly sat in a glass-enclosed cell with a KGB agent at his side.

This was his story:

In early October 1980, his work as a welder in the camp factory was suddenly stopped—with no explanation given. He was ordered to begin excavation work in a dangerous place where prisoners avoid working. He refused and was sent to a "punishment cell" (solitary confinement) for 15 days.

In November 1980 Anatoly was sent to do sanitary work in the camp sewage system. Although this meant an improvement in his daily food rations, it would have entailed transferring an old, sick prisoner to a harder job. The unconcealed aim of the authorities was to incite the other prisoners against Anatoly. He refused and was again sent to a punishment cell for 15 days.

On December 3, 1980, on Chanuka, Anatoly lit Chanuka candles. This greatly angered the prison authorities. They ordered him to put out the candles immediately. When Anatoly refused, he states that it was his elementary duty and privilege as a Jew to perform the customs of his people. Again he was sent to the special punishment cell for 15 days.

Anatoly's prayer book (a present from his wife Avital) and Jewish calendar were confiscated. After repeated requests that these charished items be returned, he was promised by the prison authorities that he would get them back. But a while later, he was informed that his case had been discussed at KGB headquarters and orders had been issued not to return the prayer book.

As a result of this incident, Anatoly was denounced as a "disciplinary problem". He was sentenced to six months in the internal prison of the camp (where the conditions are considerably harder than in the camp proper).

From the internal prison, Anatoly continued his attempts to get his prayer book back. Among other actions, he wrote a detailed letter to the Soviet authorities claiming that nowhere in Soviet law is there a prohibition against prayer books. He was informed in reply that Soviet Russia is waging war against religion. Since the camp prison is an official state institution, no religious practices could be permitted. As the prison serves as an educational institution—they said—no educationally detrimental activities would be tolerated.

Anatoly replied that according to Soviet law each individual has freedom of religion and conscience. He began to strike in protest. Again he was sentenced to 15 days in the special punishment cell—in addition to the six months already sentenced to the camp internal prison.

When he finished his 15 days in the cell, he again demanded that his prayer book be returned. He refused to work until he got it back. In reprisal, he was thrown into the punishment cell for 15 more days.

This harrowing struggle continued until the end of August 1981. In all, Anatoly spent 185 days in the punishment cell; 75 of them were spent consecutively—an unprecedented ordeal, even in Russia.

During this period, Anatoly suffered from nutritional deprivation to the point of passing out. In one instance, he was barely able to inform a fellow prisoner that he was on the verge of collapse, before he lost consciousness. As food is given only every other day in the special punishment cell and this was not a food day, Anatoly was given only an injection to strengthen him but no food at all. After four days in this condition, he was rushed to the intensive care unit of a hospital where he received emergency treatment.

Anatoly spent 33 days recuperating in the hospital.

From the hospital he was returned directly to the special punishment cell.

From there he was sent to an "open trial". Present were two prosecution witnesses, a prosecutor, a judge and the dependent.

The accusation:

(1) The defendant has not yet confessed to the CIA-espionage crimes he was convicted of in his infamous trial of July 1978. This indicates poor education.

The defendant has been a bad influence on the other camp prisioners.

Anatoly replied that indeed he never did plead guilty to the accusations for which he was being punished since 1978. Moreover, he was unable to have been a bad influence on other prisoners because most of this time at the camp had been spent in solitary confinement.

The trial lasted five minutes.

The judge sentenced Anatoly to three more years in the Chistopol Prison.

When he arrived at Chistopol, he was sentence to two months of extremely severe conditions—as punishment for having been sent again to prison.

Anatoly wrote to Brezhnev that according to the decision of the 26th Congress of the Communist Party, religion is allowed in the Soviet Union. Therefore, he demanded the return of his prayer book.

The letter was confiscated because anatoly claimed to be a member of the Human Rights Committee. According to the authorities, this committee does not exist. Anatoly replied that as he was tried and punished for belonging to this very committee, it therefore must exist.

Last March, KGB agents came from Moscow to talk with Anatoly; he refused. They offered to do favors for him in Moscow if he would co-operate with them. Anatoly again refused, claiming that they did not appear to be appropriate agents for this end.

Anatoly wrote to the Moscow Synagogue, requesting a Bible. He got word that his request was being granted, but he has not yet received any Bible.

Anatoly's mother says that despite Anatoly's deteriorating physical condition, his spirits remain high.

She is worried, however, now that he is required to weave a minimum of one sack every four hours, his physical condition won't let him, and then additional punishments will be incurred.

Following their conversation, Ida Milgrom appealled to the world:

"The tortures continue, the libels continue. They're trying to break my son physically and destroy his spirit. Is there no way to stop this arbitrary cruelty?"

HAPPY CENTENNIAL, JAMES JOYCE

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, It is with great pleasure that I draw the attention of the Senate to the centennial of the birth of James Joyce which occurs today. This is a fitting occasion to reflect on the tremendous contribution James Joyce has made to the literature of the English language.

I confess that my first thought this morning was to request that the entire text of Joyce's "Ulysses" be entered into the RECORD. That would surely enhance the literary content of even this most distinguished of publications. In the spirit of tree conservation, however, I will content myself with the insertion of a quote or two into my comments.

When considering the work of a great writer, I frequently find myself compelled to draw comparisons with the work of this Senate. The legacy of our labor on the floor of this Chamber may take the form of a great building, a dam, a diverted river, or a farsighted social program. Yet buildings crumble, dams burst, rivers dry up, and programs wither away. Sometimes quite suddenly.

How much more permanent and transcendent is the work of a great writer. The words of a master will continue to bring awareness and joy to readers generations after type is cast, quill discarded, or chisel dulled. The work of a writer can be as potent and permanent as it is portable. The life's work of James Joyce is such a thing.

Our debt to that Irish novelist may be immeasurable. If one were to make a list of the great writers of this century, he would surely include names such as those of the American Nobel Laureates, Ernest Hemingway and William Faulkner, alongside that of James Joyce. Yet, I would suggest that Joyce deserves a place of some pre-eminence. His influence was a profound one due to the formative effect he had on those two men, as well as on the whole field of 20th century writers. For Joyce revolutionized the form of the modern novel with the development of the stream of consciousness technique.

We list among Joyce's contributions "Dubliners," "Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man," "Ulysses," and "Finnegan's Wake." But because of his impact on 20th century letters, on Hemingway and Faulkner in particular, we can with justification also call "The Sun Also Rises," "The Old Man and the Sea," "Absalom, Absalom!," and "The Sound and the Fury" contributions of James Joyce. Such was his influence on the novel of this century.

Above all, we are indebted to James Joyce for his power of the written word. Others have been master technicians, but few have had Joyce's formidable talent to cast his deepest thoughts into word. His was a tremendous gift. Today, we are its beneficiaries. Indeed, so deep is his imprint on the body of literature with which the educated man must by definition be conversant, there is but one way to describe an individual who has not availed himself of Joyce's bequest. In his short story, "A Painful Case," Joyce himself put it thus: "He was outcast from life's Feast."

Mr. Raymond Lane, director of the James Joyce Society of Washington, informs me that his organization is coordinating a host of events in honor of Joyce's centennial. These include:

The American Film Institute at Kennedy Center will sponsor a Joyce film festival, including a new film not yet seen in America.

The Library of Congress will host Richard Ellman, the noted Joyce biographer, at a lecture series.

Students at American University will undertake a marathon reading of Ulysses on February 2 and 3.

A Joyce literary prize will be awarded by the society, with Waterford Glass providing a piece of their ware as first prize, and the top 20 finishers receiving new editions of Joyce classics.

The Irish Embassy will host a reception. District of Columbia Mayor Marion Barry's proclamation of today as James Joyce Day will be presented to the James Joyce Society.

A concert of authentic Edwardian music from Joyce's work will be held at Gaston Hall, Georgetown University.

A monthly series of lectures by premier American Joycean scholars will be held through Bloomsday, the day on which the action of "Ulysses" takes place.

WETA television has a show in the works on the centennial.

Dramatic readings from Joyce by local actors will be heard on radio station WAMU to celebrate the centennial.

Mr. Lane calls the celebration "a nonpartisan occasion for some merriment." I heartily agree. For those who have not yet done so, today may be the best time to begin partaking of "life's feast."

Mr. President, may I suggest to my colleagues that if any Senators are asked if they are planning to celebrate Joyce's 100th, I hope they will answer, " * * * Yes I said yes I will yes."●

PROGRAM

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, when the Senate completes its business today, it will stand in recess until the hour of 11 a.m. on tomorrow. After the recognition of the two leaders under the standing order, two Senators will be recognized on special orders in the aggregate totaling 30 minutes. At the expiration of the time allocated to the two leaders under the standing order and the time provided under special orders for the two Senators previously identified, there will be a brief period for the transaction of routine morning business to extend not more than 20 minutes in length in which Senators may speak for not more than 3 minutes each.

At the conclusion of the time for the transaction of routine morning business, the Senate will resume debate on the motion to proceed to the consideration of Calendar Order No. 251, Senate Resolution 20. Debate will proceed during the course of the day on that measure. Other business may be transacted by the Senate during the course of the day, temporarily laying aside the debate on the motion to proceed to the consideration of Senate Resolution 20, if other business can be agreed on mutually by the leadership and by unanimous consent.

It is expected the Senate will be in until approximately 6 p.m. on tomorrow, Mr. President, unless the business of the Senate can be concluded at an earlier hour.

On Thursday, Mr. President, according to the order previously entered, and which may be modified on tomorrow, the Senate will resume consideration of the Department of Justice authorization bill, at which time the Helms-Johnston busing amendment will be the pending question.

Under the situation as it presently exists, at 12 noon on Thursday the Senate will lay aside temporarily the Department of Justice authorization bill and resume consideration of the motion to proceed with the consideration of Senate Resolution 20. A vote on the motion to proceed will occur immediately and without further debate.

After the disposition of that measure, the Senate will resume consideration of the Department of Justice authorization bill, the vote to occur on the Helms-Johnston amendment at not later than 3 hours after the commencement of the debate on that measure.

Mr. President, I reiterate the request contained in the interchange or colloquy between the distinguished minority leader and myself. It is my hope that we can abbreviate the time for debate on the Helms-Johnston amendment on Thursday, or perhaps begin debate on it earlier, so that two votes, that is, the vote on the motion to proceed to the consideration of Senate Resolution 20 and the vote on the Helms-Johnston amendment, may both occur not later than perhaps 12:30 or 1 o'clock on Thursday.

The outlook for the balance on Thursday and for Friday, Mr. President, is uncertain. There are a number of items that can be dealt with, none of which can be cleared at this point. On tomorrow, I hope to have a further announcement in respect to other business to be transacted by the Senate this week.

Mr. President, I will inquire of the minority leader if there is any other matter he wishes to bring to the attention of the Senate at this time.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the majority leader. I have nothing.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the minority leader.

RECESS UNTIL TOMORROW AT 11 A.M.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I now move that the Senate recess over until the hour 11 a.m. tomorrow in accordance with the order previously entered.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, at 6:41 p.m., recessed until Wednesday, February 3, 1982, at 11 a.m.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

RESOLUTION OF THE CONFERENCE OF STATE CHIEF JUSTICES

HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 2, 1982

● Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, the Conference of Chief Justices at their fifth midyear meeting in Williamsburg, Va., on January 30, 1982, adopted an unusually strong and unanimous resolution relating to the proposed legislation pending in both Houses of Congress to restrict the jurisdiction of the Federal courts. This occurred after a study by a subcommittee of the State-Federal Relations Committee of the Conference. Every State was represented when the vote occurred and there was no dissent.

What follows is the resolution and the subcommittee report and I commend it to all of my colleagues.

RESOLUTION I—RESOLUTION RELATING TO PROPOSED LEGISLATION TO RESTRICT THE JURISDICTION OF THE FEDERAL COURTS

Whereas, there are presently pending in the United States Congress approximately twenty bills that would strip the federal courts, including the United States Supreme Court, of substantive jurisdiction in certain areas involving prayer in public schools and buildings, abortion, school desegregation and busing, and sex discrimination in the armed services; and

Whereas, the Conference of Chief Justices, without regard to the merits of constitutional issues involved, expresses its concern about the impact of these bills on state courts and views them as a hazardous experiment with the vulnerable fabric of the nation's judicial systems, arriving at this position for the following reasons, among others:

A. These proposed statutes give the appearance of proceeding from the premise that state court judges will not honor their oath to obey the United State Constitution, nor their obligations to give full force to controlling Supreme Court precedents;

B. If those proposed statutes are enacted, the current holdings of those Supreme Court decisions targeted by this legislation will remain the unchangeable law of the land, absent constitutional amendments, beyond the reach of the United States Supreme Court or state supreme courts to alter or overrule;

C. State court litigation constantly presents new situations testing the boundaries of federal constitutional rights. Without the unifying function of United States Supreme Court review, there inevitably will be divergence in state court decisions, and thus the United States Constitution could mean something different in each of the fifty states;

D. Confusion will exist as to whether and how federal acts will be enforced in state courts and, if enforced, how states may properly act against federal officers;

E. The proposed statutes would render uncertain how the state courts could declare a federal law violative of the federal Constitution and whether Congress would need to wait for a majority of the state courts to so rule before conceding an act was unconstitutional;

F. The added burden of litigation engendered by the proposed acts would seriously add to the already heavy caseload in state courts;

Now, therefore, be it Resolved, That the Conference of Chief Justices expresses its serious concerns relating to the above legislation, approves the report of the Conference's Subcommittee of the Committee on State-Federal Relations, and directs its officers to transmit that report, together with this resolution, to appropriate members of Congress.

Adopted at the Midyear Meeting in Williamsburg, Virginia on January 30, 1982.

REPORT TO THE CONFERENCE OF CHIEF JUSTICES ON PENDING FEDERAL LEGISLATION TO DEPRIVE FEDERAL COURTS OF JURISDICTION IN CERTAIN CONTROVERSIAL AREAS INVOLVING QUESTIONS OF CONSTITUTIONAL LAW

Pending in the United States Congress are approximately twenty bills that would strip the federal courts, including the Supreme Court, of substantive jurisdiction in certain areas involving prayer in public schools and buildings, abortion, school desegregation and busing, and sex discrimination in the armed services.[1] Several of these proposals would prohibit Supreme Court review of state court decisions within the defined areas.[2] as well as withdraw all jurisdiction from the federal district courts.

Provisions of the United States Constitution that are implicated directly in these proposed measures are found in article III:

SECTION 1

The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and is such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish.

SECTION 2

In all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, and those in which a State shall be Party, the Supreme Court shall have original Jurisdiction. In all the other cases before mentioned, the supreme Court shall have appellate Jurisdiction both as to Law and Fact, with such Exceptions, and under such Regulations as the Congress shall make.

Those supporting these bills reason that the withdrawal of jurisdiction is authorized by the article III, section 2, "exception" provision, a congressional power that they assert has been recognized in several Supreme Court decisions commencing with Ex parte McCardle, 74 U.S. (7 Wall.) 506, 513–14 (1868).[3] Supporters point out that until 1889 no criminal cases were appealable to the Supreme Court, because Congress had not authorized the right.[4] They further rely on prior partial jurisdictional restraints imposed on Federal courts in the Norris-LaGuardia Act of 1932[5] and the Tax Injunction Act.[6]

Opponents of the proposed legislation assert the exception cannot swallow up the rule:[7] That the article III, section 1, delegation of "the judicial Power" to the Supreme Court cannot be diminished, for example, to a limited right in the court to pass only on patent claims.[8] They rely on the language of several Supreme Court decisions starting with United States v. Klein, 80 U.S. (13 Wall.) 128 (1872). These opponents argue the exceptions "must not be such as will destroy the essential role of the Supreme Court in the Constitutional Plan,"[9] that depriving the Supreme Court of jurisdiction to review the constitutionality of state enactments would nullify the supremacy clause,[10] and that the "exceptions clause" cannot be used to deprive the Supreme Court of appellate jurisdiction in cases involving fundamental constitutional rights.[11]

It is not the intent of this subcommittee nor the purpose of this report to explore the constitutionality of these congressional efforts to nullify or contain the effect of Supreme Court constitutional interpretations involving the above issues. The published efforts of qualified scholars and commentators have illuminated the opposing views.[12] Further, several state constitutions contain language analogous to that in article III of the United States Constitution, quoted above, and members of this Conference may be confronted with issues involving the constitutionality of similar legislative measures in their own courts.[13] Nonetheless, this subcommittee would reject its assignment if it failed to express its concerns relating to these bills, and mark the potential fall-out that might accompany their enactment.

First, these proposed statutes give the appearance of proceeding from the premise that state court judges will not honor their oaths to obey the United States Constitution,[14] nor their obligation to follow Supreme Court decisions interpreting and applying that constitution, thus breaking with a 200 year practice and tradition. So viewed, these efforts to transfer jurisdiction to the state courts for these purposes neither enhance the image of those institutions nor demonstrate confidence that state court judges will do their duty.[15] Changes in substantive constitutional law amounting to amendments should not be attempted by excluding federal jurisdiction in the hope that state courts will give less than full force to controlling Supreme Court precedents. The procedure that should be used for such amendments is provided in the constitution itself.

Second, when state court judges honor their oaths, the holdings of those Supreme Court decisions targeted by this legislation will be cast in stone, beyond the reach of the Supreme Court to alter or overrule.

Finally, it must be recognized that state court litigation constantly presents new situations testing the boundaries of federal constitutional rights and requiring judgment calls on applicability of federal constitutional principles. Without the unifying function of Supreme Court review, the United States Constitution could well mean something different in each of the fifty states. Aside from the obvious effect of this anomaly on the nation's citizens, the resulting inconsistencies in legal precedent and the more frequent jurisdictional disputes would further overload state courts.

We believe these considerations, without regard to constitutional issues, should redflag the above legislation in Congress. We question the wisdom of these bills and view them as a hazardous experiment on the vulnerable fabric of the nation's judicial systems.

Repectfully submitted,

Chief Judge Robert C. Murphy, Chief Justice Clement Clay Torbert, Jr., Justice Robert F. Utter, Chief Justice Robert N. Wilentz, Chief Justice W. Ward Reynoldson, Chairman.

SCARS FROM AWACS

HON. ROBERT K. DORNAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 2, 1982

● Mr. DORNAN. Mr. Speaker, this week's Newsweek reports that the administration is angered by the Saudis resuming relations with Libya, fostering a rapprochement with Syria, financing a billion-dollar purchase of French Mirage jet fighters by Egypt, and maybe using economic leverage to dissuade Egypt from signing an agreement with Israel on Palestinian autonomy. When reading of these events, I was reminded of the Marvin Stone editorial "Scars From AWACS" which I reread last night. Mr. Stone was so right when he wrote, "This was the wrong battle, in the wrong place, at the wrong time—and over the wrong issue."

Below is Mr. Stone's entire editorial.

SCARS FROM AWACS

(By Marvin Stone)

President Reagan understandably is elated over his resourceful victory in the battle over the sale of AWACS to Saudi Arabia. Unquestionably, his success in escaping what appeared to be inevitable defeat represented a master-stroke of political persuasion.

But it would be unfortunate if, amidst the euphoria, the White House failed to recognize the true significance of this bruising battle.

The significance is not that Mr. Reagan retains a remarkable capacity for selling his causes to skeptical legislators.

Nor is it that he has avoided what might well have been a disaster for the conduct of the nation's foreign policy.

The real significance is that the President was compelled to expand enormous political capital and to devote many hours of precious time to win a battle that need not have been fought at a time when domestic problems were demanding every measure of White House attention.

To paraphrase a famous general during the Korean War: This was the wrong battle, in the wrong place, at the wrong time—and over the wrong issue. The facts are quite clear—and have been from the outset:

Item No. 1: In the final weeks of the Carter administration, overeager U.S. Air Force officials encouraged Saudi Arabia to ask for five AWACS—and persuaded the Saudis that there were no serious political obstacles to a deal.

Item No. 2: The deal was not essential in terms of U.S. strategic interests. Four U.S.-owned and operated AWACS already were based in Saudi Arabia. The Saudis had welcomed the planes with the outbreak of the Iraq-Iran war in September, 1980. And there is no evidence that they were unwilling to continue the arrangement with the Reagan administration.

Item No. 3: President Reagan was not obliged to approve the AWACS sale, which he inherited together with a deal to supply the Saudis with equipment to enhance the capability of F-15 interceptors. In fact, when these agreements were reviewed by the National Security Council last spring, Secretary of State Alexander Haig argued that the AWACS sale should be shelved. He warned of a congressional backlash that would jeopardize the rest of the Saudi arms package.

Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger, a longtime Reagan confidant, demurred. He contended that it was essential to go through with the AWACS transaction to strengthen America's strategic ties with Saudi Arabia and to develop a U.S. military presence in the Persian Gulf region. Weinberger insisted that Senate approval presented no serious problems.

The President, hospitalized by an assassin's bullet, accepted Weinberger's arguments without consulting Congress. The consequences of this oversight became immediately apparent.

Mr. Reagan found himself facing a costly battle with a Congress that was adamantly opposed to selling the planes to Saudi Arabia—a battle that inevitably would strain ties with many of his staunchest supporters and one that would require a major expenditure of precious time and effort, with extravagant promises to some senators, and veiled threats to others.

All this took place in the first critical months of an administration pledged to give priority to the nation's grave economic problems, and hoping to regain dwindling support for increasingly controversial budget and tax programs.

True, the President has emerged victorious from the AWACS battle—but at the expense of vastly more important issues. Nor has the victory come without a divisive struggle that has left lasting scars in the Senate, not unlike those Jimmy Carter left in the aftermath of his drive to win approval for the Panama Canal treaties.

For the White House, there is at least one inescapable lesson: The way our foreign policy is being formulated is gravely flawed and requires a major overhaul. In the AWACS affair, Mr. Reagan acted on advice from a team of advisers that, with the singular exception of Alexander Haig, is lacking in acumen, not to mention good political savvy.●

PRESIDENTIAL DETERMINATION TO AUTHORIZE CONTINUED AID TO EL SALVADOR

HON. ANTHONY TOBY MOFFETT

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 2, 1982

● Mr. MOFFETT. Mr. Speaker, when the Congress voted last December to provide $65 million in economic and military assistance to El Salvador, as part of the foreign aid bill, we did so under the condition that the President could certify that the junta is making progress in five crucial areas. These conditions included progress in: (1) respect for human rights; (2) control over the military; (3) social and economic reform, including land reform; (4) holding fair and free elections; and, (5) investigating the deaths of four American religious workers in December 1980, and two American land reform specialists in January 1981. Last week, the President submitted to Congress a document intended to fulfill this requirement. Those of us who are concerned about the tragic violence and injustice in El Salvador were dismayed by the vague generalities contained in the report, which was aimed more at justifying repression by the Salvadoran junta than at certifying progress in curbing repression.

The conditions mandated by Congress reflected a strong desire to stem the torture and murder of innocent civilians by a government that is receiving extensive U.S. support. The administration's failure to take these concerns seriously reveals the inhumanity of its policy toward El Salvador. I would like to include in the RECORD a copy of the administration's certification, in order that my colleagues and constituents may scrutinize it, and decide for themselves whether or not the issues of justice and human rights in El Salvador have been addressed in an objective, humane and intelligent manner.

JUSTIFICATION FOR PRESIDENTIAL DETERMINATION TO AUTHORIZE CONTINUED SECURITY ASSISTANCE FOR EL SALVADOR

Section 728 of the International Security and Development Cooperation Act of 1981, Public Law 97-113, states that a wide range of security assistance may be provided and certain military personnel assigned to El Salvador only if the President makes a specific certification. The following constitutes the justification for this certification, pursuant to Sections 728 (b), (d) and (e).

The issues on which periodic certification are required have been important elements of the Salvadoran government's policies since the overthrow of President Humberto Romero in October 1979. Romero was the last in a line of military officers who had ruled El Salvador for nearly fifty years. On October 15, 1979, a group of military officers who sought to introduce economic and political reforms overthrew Romero and created a civilian-military coalition called the Revolutionary Governing Junta. The original junta lasted three months. Its military members then reached an agreement with the Christian Democratic Party to form a new government. Despite several changes in its composition, this second junta has remained in power and is committed to sweeping economic and political changes aimed at reducing the causes of the present division and strife. The junta has instituted a series of reforms which are being implemented despite the violent opposition of groups on the extreme right and of Marxist guerrillas and terrorists, supported from Cuba and Nicaragua, who favor armed revolution. Each of the specific issues are addressed below:

Compliance with Internationally-recognized Human Rights. A full report on the troubled human rights situation in El Salvador for 1981 will be sent to Congress at the end of this month. El Salvador is now in a state of active civil strife involving the government and armed groups of the left and right. As in similar circumstances in history, such civil strife has produced violations of human rights by elements on each side, because of partisan animosities, acts of retaliation, the settling of personal scores, and the disruption of the judicial system. These are long-term problems, and their correction is difficult over the short-term.

Along with the general disintegration of institutions in El Salvador after the October 1979 coup, the judicial system had nearly collapsed by January 1981. Conditions of internal strife make it possible for terrorists to intimidate judges, witnesses, and government officials, blocking or slowing the process of investigation and judgment. Investigative efforts are impeded by the chaos caused by guerrilla and terrorist activities and movement of people out of the country and within it. These conditions greatly complicate the Salvadoran government's efforts to bring an end to human rights abuses.

Despite coup threats from the extreme right, intensified guerrilla warfare from the extreme left, and terrorism from both sides, the Salvadoran government has made significant progress in moving El Salvador toward a democratic process for resolving conflicts. It is also implementing important socioeconomic reforms designed to reduce the causes of the present terrorism and violence. Junta President Jose Napoleon Duarte's commitment to eliminating human rights abuses is a matter of public record. He himself has been the victim of abuses in the past. He was deprived of his electoral victory as president in 1972, arrested, beaten and exiled. Members of his Christian Democratic Party have been, and continue to be, victims of violence from both the extreme left and the extreme right. More than 20 Christian Democratic mayors were murdered during 1981.

The Salvadoran government, since the overthrow of General Romero, has taken explicit actions to end human rights abuses. The paramilitary organization "ORDEN" has been outlawed, although some of its former members may still be active. A military code of conduct was adopted in October 1980 explicitly prohibiting any actions by military personnel injurious to human rights. While the Salvadoran conflict, like most civil conflicts, has been characterized by many examples of savagery on all sides, the military high command has instructed the officer corps to ensure that all soldiers adhere to the code of conduct. A number of officers sympathetic to the violent right have been removed from command positions or reassigned to positions less sensitive to the domestic situation. Nevertheless, ultrarightist ad hoc groups still operate without official sanction. Their apparent loose organization and the intermittent nature of their activities, coupled with the apparent complicity of some individual members of the security forces, makes identification of possible perpetrators very difficult.

In sum, despite formidable obstacles, the Salvadoran government is making a concerted and significant effort to comply with internationally recognized human rights.

Control Over All Elements of its Own Armed Forces. This is a key issue in attempting to ensure a democratic future for El Salvador. Traditionally, the National Guard and the Treasury Police were often used to serve the private interests of their officers and of powerful landowners and businessmen. It is a characteristic feature of many societies, including El Salvador's, that personal ties often are stronger than legal obligations to standing regulations or orders from top government officials. These relationships are extremely difficult to eliminate totally, making the establishment of full central authority over subordinate officials a slow process Despite the obstacles, the government is gradually consolidating its control. Elections to set in motion a democratic process, whereby the people can choose their own leaders will be a major step in strengthening the legitimacy of the central authorities.

Through the removal of officers, institution of a code of conduct, and command emphasis on civilian-military relations and halting abuses, the government has taken concrete steps to bring all elements of its armed forces under control. These efforts are beginning to have a positive effect. The level of violence—and particularly the number of deaths — is difficut to quanitify, but statistics compiled by our Embassy in San Salvador indicate a declining level of violence over the past year and a decrease in alleged abuses by security forces. There has been a definite trend in this regard.

Despite the government's intentions to do so, all abuses will not end in the immediate future. The guerrillas continue to justify terror and violence as acceptable tactics in their efforts to disrupt the society and overthrow the government. Moreover, guerrilla bands routinely operate accompanied by family members and other non-combatants, making it difficult to avoid non-combatant casualties when these groups are found and engaged by the military.

One of the principal missions of our military trainers in El Salvador is to increase the professionalism of the armed forces and improve the system of military discipline and command and control, thus reducing the abuses suffered in the past by the civilian population at the hands of the armed forces. To the extent that members of the armed forces see themselves first as military professionals, they are less likely to take action on behalf of partisan political causes or private interests. Discipline in the army as sensitivity to the problem of military abuse of civilians have improved and should improve further through professional training programs, such as those we are instituting for Salvadoran officers and infantrymen in the United States.

Economic and Political Reforms. When the Christian Democrats joined the Revolutionary Governing Junta they did so to open the political process in El Salvador and carry out socioeconomic reforms. One of the cornerstones of the reform program is land reform. This program has been particularly targetted by extremists of the right and left. Through assassinations of agrarian reform officials and intimidation of peasants, the extreme right seeks to defeat the implementation of the law, while the extreme left is attempting to derail a program that has seriously undercut its popular support. One part of that program, the distribution of landed estates over 1,235 acres to farmers who work on them, has been carried out and compensation to former owners is being made. A monthly report on beneficiaries, titles granted and compensation paid is now periodically provided to Congressman Long. A second part of the program is designed to transfer ownership of small farms to all tenants and sharecroppers. The titling process got off to a slow start. The process has accelerated since midyear and provisional titles are now being issued at the rate of 4,000 per month. The Salvadoran Campesinos Union (UCS), in response to the government's request, has prepared a report detailing problems with the program which remain to be addressed in the months ahead. There is a legislative prohibition against U.S. assistance being used in planning for expropriation or in paying compensation to former landowners.

Other reforms already achieved include the establishment of marketing authorities for the country's major exports, coffee and sugar, and of government majority participation in the banking system. These ambitious changes are being carried out under wartime conditions, which makes implementation all the more difficult.

Free Elections. Free elections are the cornerstone of the Salvadoran government's policy. President Duarte, other members of the junta, and Defense Secretary Jose Garcia, have made clear privately and publicly their commitment to free and fair constituent assembly elections in March 1982 and presidential elections in 1983. Planning for the constituent assembly elections scheduled to take place on March 28, 1982, is well underway. A central electoral council to conduct the elections has been established and is functioning. The elections council drew up a draft election law in May 1981 and invited all parties that renounce violence to participate in the electoral process. The new electoral law was promulgated by the junta in December after thorough discussion among the political parties. Seven parties, ranging from the non-violent left to the far right, are participating in the process. The Salvadoran government has sounded out dozens of democratic countries on the possibility of their sending electoral observers, and formal invitations were sent out at year's end.

The government has explicitly left open the door for others, including the opposition political-guerrilla coalition, the FMLN-FDR, to participate. Two leftist parties associated with the FMLN-FDR, the social democratic MNR and the communist UDN, were designated by the government as legally constituted political parties with the need only to comply with a simple procedure to be inscribed on the ballot. President Duarte publicly invited all political parties and groups who renounce violence and wish to participate in the elections to join in a dialogue on the electoral ground rules. The government has offered amnesty to guerrillas and removed the legal state of siege for political parties, which will permit all to campaign freely. In response, the FMLN-FDR had denounced the elections and rejected the government's standing invitation to join in a discussion of electoral issues. Instead, the FMLN-FDR has maintained that any elections must be preceded by negotiations between the government and all elements of the FMLN-FDR resulting in a restructuring of the government and the military. Moreover, the guerrillas have prepared and are implementing an accelerated campaign of sabotage and terrorism to intimidate and to disrupt the elections, as evidenced by the attack on Ilopango airport on January 27.

Efforts to Investigate the Murders of U.S. Citizens (required under Section 728(e)). The investigations of the murders of the four American churchwomen and the two land reform advisors have been underway over the past year. All key Slavadoran officials fully recognize how important it is to resolve these matters and have stated publicly and privately that the investigations of these crimes will continue until those responsible are brought to justice.

In the Churchwomen case, six members of the national Guard have been under detention since May 1981. On October 27, the government of El Salvador formally requested additional FBI assistance with this investigation (and the land reform advisors case) and in early December an FBI representative saw leading members of the government most concerned with the issue. (In the early part of the investigation, the FBI had done fingerprint and ballistics analysis at the request of the Salvadorans.) To reinvigorate the investigation, the present investigating commission, composed of high-level officials, established a new working group in early December 1981 to collate prior reports, review and analyze them, interview all witnesses as well as the six National Guardsmen detained on suspicion of participation, and determine what technical assistance the FBI can provide. The working group has been hard at work throughout the past two months. It has uncovered additional evidence which gives hope of substantial new progress.

The Salvadoran Government has also been pursuing in good faith the investigation of the murders of the two American agrarian reform advisors at the Sheraton Hotel in San Salvador. Two suspects have been identified. In April 1981, the Salvadoran government arrested one of the two suspects and requested the extradition of his suspected accomplice from the U.S. On December 19 a Salvadoran judge signed an order suspending all judicial action in the case. The Salvadoran Attorney General has appealed this judicial action. The appeal has stayed the lower court's judicial order pending the appellate review. Meanwhile, one of the suspects has been released in San Salvador and is reportedly now in a neighboring country. The other suspect is free on bail in Miami pending resolution in U.S. courts of his extradition case. The new Salvadoran working group established to reinvestigate both this case and the Churchwomen's murder case will shortly be pursuing, with our technical assistance, several new avenues of investigation which we hope will lead to additional evidence.

On these bases, it is concluded that the Government of El Salvador has made a concerted, significant, and good faith effort to deal with the complex political, social, and human rights problems it is confronting and that progress is being made. It should be notred that it is only one year since the general guerrrilla offensive and outside assistance to the guerrilla from Nicaragua, Cuba and other communist and radical states forced the United States to reassess its policy towards El Salvador. Since that time our concern for the elements of this certification have become a factor of increased significance in our bilateral relationship with El Salvador. There can be no doubt that much more must be done in these areas, but significant initial steps have been taken in this short timeframe. Progress is apparent and we have every reason to believe it will continue.

It is therefore concluded that the considerations set forth in Section 728(d) and (e) of the International Security and Development Cooperation Act of 1981 are satisfied.●

TOMORROW'S LEADERS—SERVICE ACADEMY NOMINEES

HON. JERRY M. PATTERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 2, 1982

● Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, one of the most rewarding annual events which I enjoy is nominating students from my congressional district to our Nation's armed service academies.

I make it a practice to nominate "the best and the brightest," and to make the selection process as deserving as possible for the nominee. The criteria set down by my reviewing committee is rigid and demanding. This insures that the most qualified young people will represent my district and its schools and communities at the service academies.

This year I have nominated 35 outstanding young men and women from my district for appointments to the service academies. I am sure that my constituents join their families and me in wishing them well. Whether they attend a service academy or not, these young people are a credit to their community and their country.

My nominees to the Military Academy at West Point are: Kevin Adler, La Quinta High School; Mario Alegre, Santiago High School; Gary Clark, a previous cadet; Christopher Elliott, Irvine High School; Daniel Guzman, Parkland High School; Edward Motley, Buena Park High School; Dean Nakadate, Los Alamitos High School; Michael Pompeo, Los Amigos High School; Steve Schlumpberger, Bolsa Grande High School; Lawrence Tubbs, Cypress High School; Scott Urback, U.S. Marines.

My nominees to the Naval Academy at Annapolis are: Mario Alegre, Santiago High School; Daniel Baggett, Santiago High School; William Brogan, Bolsa Grande High School: Shawn Dennis, Rancho Alamitos High School; Milissa Dion, Cypress Community College; Michael Dorko, Magnolia High School; Christopher Elliott, Irvine High School; Daniel Hernandez, Sunny Slope High School; Michael Howard, Bolsa Grande High School; Terence Kelly, Western High School; Mark Lunde, Los Alamitos High School; Joseph Luntz, Los Alamitos High School; Daniel O'Malley, Mater Dei High School; Samuel Napolitano, Los Amigos High School; Michael Pompeo, Los Amigos High School; Steve Schlumpberger, Bolsa Grande High School; Andrea Simpson, Garden Grove High School; Brian Solo, Pacifica High School; Jacinto Soriano, Westminster High School; Scott Urback, U.S. Marines.

BRIG. GEN. JAMES L. DOZIER

HON. WM. S. BROOMFIELD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 2, 1982

● Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to add my congratulations to General Dozier and his family upon his release from Red Brigade terrorists, and to praise the Italian authorities for their excellent efforts in securing the general's freedom.

By all accounts, General Dozier comported himself in an admirable fashion during his captivity. His behavior and discipline served as an outstanding example of how to conduct oneself under extreme conditions of duress, and how to adhere to those values that form the foundation of both our national philosophy and NATO's philosophy.

General Dozier has had a long history of accomplishment and valor on behalf of the United States. He is a West Point graduate and also has a master of science degree in aerospace engineering from the University of Arizona. As a combat officer in Vietnam, General Dozier won both a Silver Star and a Bronze Star with two oak leaf clusters. He is a professional of the first order, and in my opinion, represents the finest qualities of our country.

Praise is wholely appropriate for the Italian authorities as well. By releasing General Dozier, they delivered a powerful blow against international terrorism. That they could do so in a manner consistent with democratic standards is worthy of recognition. The United States, and indeed all of the NATO allies, owe the Italian authorities a debt of gratitude. They operated in a highly professional manner. They now serve as an example to other Western counter-terrorist forces of how to get the job done and save lives in the process.●

A TRIBUTE TO JAN PALACH

HON. PHILIP M. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 2, 1982

● Mr. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, January 19 of this year marked the 13th anniversary of the passing of Jan Palach, a 21-year-old philosophy student from Prague who gave his life on this day in protest to the Russian invasion of Czechoslovakia in 1968. On January 25, of that year, tens of thousands of Czech citizens participated in the funeral march on St. Wenceslans Square and this day was unofficially proclaimed a national day of mourning.

That event sometimes seems distant in our memory until we recollect the even more glaring tragedies of the present Afganistan and Poland. For a major portion of this century the bankrupt ideology of communism has crushed the freedom and dreams of many nations and people and yet we still see the renewed courage and spirit of men like Lech Walesa who dare to resist. Clearly Jan Palach's memory must ring in their minds and spur them to renewed attempts to regain their liberty. Let us hope that someday their attempts will not all prove to have been in vain. Let us hope as well that day comes soon.

Jan Palach set a great example of courage. Let that memory never fade until all nations and all people are free from the scourge he died resisting.●

THE UNSUNG HEROES

HON. ELLIOTT H. LEVITAS

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 2, 1982

● Mr. LEVITAS. Mr. Speaker, I want to take a minute to recognize the unsung heroes who work in Congress; namely, the staff members who work on the day-to-day, individual problems of our constituents. Congressmen usually get a lot of publicity and praise, but we all know the caseworkers on our staff are the ones who cut through the redtape and serve as the ombudsmen between the public and the Federal Government. They share the frustrations and anguish, and the joy and achievements of citizens who need our help.

I was pleased and proud to see the true story told in recent articles published in the Rockdale Neighbor, a local newspaper in my district. I would like to share with my colleagues the following articles on the outstanding work of my district office staff. I believe these articles stand as a tribute to all congressional caseworkers and staffs. They deserve recognition for their dedication and service.

[From the Rockdale Neighbor, Jan. 28, 1982]

CONSTITUENTS' PROBLEMS SOLVED BY LEVITAS AIDES

(By Marcia Killingworth)

The man quiet and a little bent by age, slips, nonrusively into the office and is greeted by name and with a warm smile from the woman at the reception desk. He comes to the office every month now.

His contact with the people there began a while back when he was having trouble filling out house payment forms. Now he brings in the forms and they fill them out correctly and get them in the mail.

A Rockdale boy recently dying of cancer, wanted to see his brother before he died. Unfortunately his brother was overseas in the service. The office, the same one where the house payment forms are filled out each month began to make calls. The brother was in Rockdale County two days later—emergency leave granted.

"I think that case meant the most to me." says Rockdale resident and aid to Congressman Elliott Levitas, Chest Benton. Benton is one of the persons on Levitas' home office team who helps constitutents solve problems. He has been with the congressman for two years and two months. His days he said, "are never the same."

The Congressman's home office offers a myriad of services. His aides, Benton, Mike Sloan, a graduate of Emory Law School; Susan Rowall, an experienced worker in government and Phyllis Kennedy, the head of the home office, act as ombudsmen for the public. They are the go-between with Federal agencies and persons who have problems, need to get to resources, or have opinions on these Federal agencies.

"We cut through the red tape." Sloan said, "We work with VA (Veterans's Administration, Social Security, Small Business Administration, HUD (Housing and Urban Development)—and if they have a state or local problems or question, we try to direct them to the correct agency or person to handle those problems."

The aides at Levitas' home office, Benton said, also work with clubs, such as 4-H, in getting them access to Congressional research. Students from grammar school to college, can also use the congressman's office for its connection with the Congressional Research Service.

The Department of Family and Children Services is used frequently, as is United Way and many of the office's callers are asking questions and wanting answers about the Internal Revenue Service.

They work on immigration problems, help those Fourth District constituents who may have had an accident overseas, forward constituents' comments on proposed legislation and a multitude of other services.

Much of their work is done on the telephone, and much of their success depends on knowing who to call. Benton, whose wife Elaine (formerly Elaine Lester) is a Rockdale native, is said to be the office wizard at the job.

"Chester's a master on the phone," Sloan smiles.

Also in the "not too shabby" category is Ms. Kennedy, who spent her time in the Georgia County Extension Services and knows about many Federal programs the others are unfamiliar with. When Sloan received a call requesting information on community gardens, he was floored. Ms. Kennedy was aware of the Extension Services program which is aimed at establishing community gardens, a program which goes as far as helping the interested person pick out seed. Sloan, armed with the valuable information was able to help the constituent.

However, Sloan's most meaningful case may prove to be a boon to the medical profession nationwide. A doctor at Emory, British, had made a portable kidney dialysis machine in his basement. The project was started when his wife, who has a kidney disease and requires the machine, wished to travel with him and was unable to. The doctor, Sloan said, wanted to have prototypes built so they could be tested. However, before any prototypes could be made, the Federal Food and Drug Administration had to give its OK. Federal agencies are usually backed up in work and the doctor's requests for the approval were not being answered. He called Levitas' office. Sloan got in touch with the FDA, the prototypes were approved and are now being tested.

"The man is obviously brilliant," Sloan said, adding that the portable dialysis machine could mean an enriched life for many Americans.

Of course, what job doesn't have its rainy days on, as Ms. Kennedy puts it, the full moons. As is the case with most offices where staff members do business with the public, they do get their more interesting calls: the woman who is convinced her pest control man is poisoning her, not her termites; the man who has Russians excavating in his basement and the musician who is convinced someone is putting sugar in his trumpet and wants the Congressman's staff to do something, for heaven's sake.

Despite the unique stories, the endless hours on the telephone and constant work, the people in Levitas' office here love their work.

"We run the whole gamut," as Benton said. "We get calls from everybody."

HUMAN INTEREST NEEDED

(By Marcia Killingsworth)

When looking for someone to represent him in his own district's office. Fourth District Con. Elliott Levitas requires experience and an interest in human beings.

On a recent visit to the district, which presently includes DeKalb and Rockdale and may include part of Fulton and all of Newton if the proposed reapportionment plan is approved, Levitas said candidates for the jobs must be capable.

A lot of their success at the job has to do with experience," he said, in local government or something to do with government like the Council on Aging."

Most of the aides have worked with a political candidate, although, Levitas stresses this is not a political job.

And he is pleased with his present home staff. They go above and beyond the call of duty, develop a personal interest, share frustrations and anguish," he said.

"If someone is being hassled by government or not being taken seriously they call us," Levitas said, adding that his staff help with Social Security disability, getting persons into Veteran's hospitals and with immigration problems. His staff also assists local governments, local school boards and many small businesses and the Small Business Administration.

"They are ombudsmen, Levitas said, unconsciously echoing staff member Mike Sloan's assessment of his job. "They cut through the redtape," the congressman adds, smiling as he picks up the dispenser on his desk, clearly labeled and recognizable as Red Tape. "I keep this on my desk all the time."●

RESOLUTION ON THE RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE WHITE HOUSE CONFERENCE ON AGING

HON. BENJAMIN S. ROSENTHAL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 2, 1982

● Mr. ROSENTHAL. Mr. Speaker, I have just introduced House Resolution 332, a resolution endorsing the recommendations of the 1981 White House Conference on Aging.

The resolution I have recently introduced is designed to summarize the goals of the Conference and provide a broad outline for future congressional consideration. This resolution will demonstrate the House's commitment to our older Americans in the wake of recent budget cutbacks.

This conference marked the culmination of a process designed to develop a national policy on aging. It began last spring with 9,000 community forums throughout the country involving over 300,000 participants, continued through the year with conferences in every State and territory in the Nation, and ended with a national 4-day meeting in Washington.

These conferences have always represented a significant legislative tool; out of the 1961 conference came recommendations for medicare and social service programs for senior centers and counseling for the elderly. The 1971 conferences produced a recommendation that the mandatory retirement age be raised from 65 to 70, development of the Meals-on-Wheels program, passage of the Older Americans Act and enactment of the supplemental security income program. These laws have changed the quality of life for all older persons in America in a way which has been truly responsive to their needs and wishes.

If you would like to cosponsor this resolution, please contact Marilyn Shindler of my staff at extension 52601.

The resolution follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the House of Representatives that the House give priority attention to all official recommendations of the White House Conference on Aging in achieving the goal of establishing a far-reaching program for present and future generations of older Americans, including recommendations to—

One, safeguard current eligibility conditions, retirement ages, and benefit levels in the social security program;

Two, broaden opportunities for older workers to remain active within the labor force;

Three, assure older individuals an income sufficient to maintain a minimum level of dignity and comfort;

Four, ensure all Americans have access to adequate health care;

Five, take interim steps to improve medicare, through expanded home health coverage and reimbursement levels that better reflect current medical fees and the needs of older Americans;

Six, make available an adequate number of federally assisted housing units to meet the needs of the elderly;

Seven, provide complete and comprehensive recreational, nutritional and educational services at community senior citizen centers and elsewhere on the local level; and

Eight, strengthen the federal commitment to gerontological research, education and training.●

NAFCU SUPPORTS BANKRUPTCY CHANGES

HON. BILLY LEE EVANS

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 2, 1982

● Mr. EVANS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, today I would like to speak to my colleagues on the subject of bankruptcy and how it affects financial institutions, specifically credit unions. I had the pleasure of addressing the annual Congressional Caucus of the National Association of Federal Credit Unions—the only national association exclusively representing the interests of federally chartered credit unions—this week. There seems to be a great concern among Federal credit union members regarding the effect of bankruptcies on the future of consumer credit for qualified borrowers with legitimate credit needs.

For many borrowers, their credit union is often the only source of consumer credit at anything less than usurious rates. It is my belief, and that of the credit union leaders I met with this morning, that the alarming increase in bankruptcy filings is due, at least in part, to certain provisions of the Bankruptcy Code of 1978. There is an increasing amount of evidence that suggests that this act does not provide the proper balance between debtors and creditors.

In September 1981, the results of a survey conducted by the National Credit Union Administration (NCUA) to determine the impact of the 1978 Bankruptcy Code on loan chargeoffs at Federal credit unions was published. It was determined that 53 percent of credit union chargeoffs due to bankruptcy were attributed to the more liberal provisions of the Bankruptcy Code. When these loan chargeoffs occur at credit unions, the entire membership is penalized.

A prime example of this occurred at Navy Federal Credit Union, which is the largest credit union in the country. In 1980, the first full year of operation under the new code, there was a 60-percent rise in loan chargeoffs at Navy Federal Credit Union. This resulted in a drain on assets that worked out to approximately $5 per member.

The net result the increase in bankruptcies is having on consumers can be recognized not only in reduced dividends, but also through higher loan rates and more restrictive loan policies.

I have introduced a bill, H.R. 4786, which I believe addresses some areas for improvement of the current Bankruptcy Code. It is my hope that I will have the full support of my colleagues when this bill comes to the House floor later this year.

I urge those who are not yet supporting this measure to do so. I would like to include in the RECORD at this time a list of my distinguished colleagues who presently are listed as cosponsors of this important legislation, along with my thanks for their support.

TRIBUTE TO THE LATE JOHN JARMAN

HON. ROBERT McCLORY

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 2, 1982

● Mr. McCLORY. Mr. Speaker, it comes with great sadness to me that our former distinguished colleague, Congressman John Jarman of Oklahoma, has passed on.

In addition to his illustrious career in this body, where his conscientious and effective service as a legislator was of the highest rank, John Jarman was an esteemed and close personal friend. His former wife, Marylin, and John Jarman were frequently in the company of my wife, Doris, and me. We enjoyed the warmth of their companionship and the compatibility of their philosophy and political views with our own. We respected and admired the ideals and the moral and spiritual qualities which they embodied.

In my view, Congressman John Jarman epitomized those qualities of leadership, integrity, intelligence, and judgment which are representative of the highest in congressional service. He was devoted to his committee work, attentive to the legislative measures which came before him as chairman of a subcommittee of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee and on other committees on which he served. A graduate of Yale University and Harvard Law School, John Jarman combined his excellent educational background with a personal dedication to public service. From my personal observation, I can attest that in every public and private action in which he was involved, John Jarman attracted respect, honor, and support for the actions he took and the views he articulated.

In his capacity as chairman of our U.S. delegation to various Inter-Parliamentary Union conferences, Congressman John Jarman had an opportunity to represent our Nation in contacts with various other national leaders, both at the parliamentary and executive levels of Government. He was an ideal spokesman and representative of our Nation on all of those occasions. Indeed, as I joined with him on numerous occasions at public gatherings in foreign capitals, I took pride in both what John Jarman said and the manner in which he carried out his role as our U.S. representative.

Mr. Speaker, it is with a sense of deep personal emotion and loss that I rise to eulogize former Congressman John Jarman. I know that I also express the feelings of my wife, Doris, in these words of respect, affection, and deep sympathy to all members of his family.●

ECONOMIC RECOVERY TAX ACT

HON. ROMANO L. MAZZOLI

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 2, 1982

● Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, today I have introduced a bill to repeal the leasing provision enacted as part of last year's Economic Recovery Tax Act.

This year, with the projected budget deficit soaring to $100 billion, and all sectors of the economy being squeezed by interest rates, the pressure to cut Federal expenditures or increase revenues grows daily.

One way to do this is to recapture Government revenues lost due to unwise tax law changes. Foremost in these unwise tax law changes is the leasing provision, which allows unprofitable companies to sell their tax breaks to profitable companies.

It is estimated that this provision alone could cost the Treasury some $2.6 billion in lost revenues this fiscal year.

When I voted for portions of the President's budget and tax package last year, I did so with the determination that the new cuts would be dealt out in an evenhanded manner. But, this leasing provision puts money in the hands of profitable companies—including many of the corporate giants—who need the relief the least.

I urge my colleagues to join me in removing from the books this scandalous piece of legislation.●

U.S. FOREIGN AID TO NORTHERN IRELAND

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 2, 1982

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, on December 10, I introduced H.R. 5163, a bill to provide $50 million in economic relief and rehabilitation assistance for Northern Ireland. I am pleased to say that the bill already has 15 cosponsors.

I sponsored this legislation because of my fervent belief that a meaningful and lasting solution in Northern Ireland cannot and will not come until concrete steps are taken to address the fundamental economic problems which divide Northern Ireland. Writing in the November edition of Europe 1981, Roy Stemman presents the economic problems as they are.

> Unemployment: The number of people without jobs in Northern Ireland by the end of 1980 represented 16.3 percent of the working population—a figure that has risen to 20 percent. Unemployment is now twice as high as the (European) Community average. Rural areas in the west and south are the worst affected notably around Newry and Dungannon.
> Earnings for those with jobs in the Province are lower than elsewhere in the United Kingdom, currently about 8 percent less than the national average (and 59 percent of the Community average). That means that welfare payments are correspondingly higher than elsewhere in Britain. As well as being relatively poorly paid, the people of the Province also work the longest hours.
>
> Northern Ireland lacks energy resources and as a result pays considerably more for its energy than other parts of the U.K. Again, because it is on the extreme periphery of the Community and of the U.K., the Province has to bear the additional cost of transport for its imports and exports adding about 10 percent to prices.
>
> Less than 50 percent of families in Ulster own a car. About a third of all homes have central heating compared with 55 percent of the U.K. as a whole.
> Nowhere is the poor standard of living more evident than in housing. An official survey as long ago as 1974 revealed that 20 percent of Northern Ireland's houses were statutorily unfit for human habitation and a further 17.5 percent in urgent need of attention.

The article does not limit its focus to identifying the economic problems of Northern Ireland. He sees optimism based on his belief that the European Community may come forth with a new financial initiative to aid Ulster. This initiative combined with the one called for in my legislation could present the greatest hope for a lasting solution to the problems of the North.

The thrust of my legislation is based upon the belief that an economic component must be a part of any political solution for Northern Ireland. The assistance provided by this legislation would be used solely for humanitarian, rehabilitation, and relief purposes. It would be controlled by this Government and distributed according to a plan devised by representatives of all parties and governments which have an economic relationship with Northern Ireland. It is my firm belief that such assistance would be an incentive for all parties to the conflict to begin to address a just political solution.

Central to H.R. 5163 is the condition that this aid cannot be provided until the British Government declares its intention to remove its presence from Northern Ireland. Concurrent with this declaration is the requirement that Great Britain must be a part of any discussion which works toward an economic and ultimately, a political solution.

It is important to note that both President Reagan and former President Carter have stated that economic assistance for Northern Ireland would be an appropriate role for the United States to undertake. It is my hope that this legislation can build upon the belief that U.S. aid can make a difference in helping to promote a peaceful solution to the tragedy which is Ulster.

As chairman of the bipartisan Ad Hoc Congressional Committee for Irish Affairs, I plan to make this bill our highest priority this year. It is a proposal which merits discussion, not only in human rights circles, but in foreign policy circles as well. It is supported by the major Irish-American organizations including the Ancient Order of Hibernians and the Irish National Caucus, in this country, which are working with us to bring this bill before the Foreign Affiars Committee for hearings and are unified in their support of it. I urge my colleagues to join us in this initiative and cosponsor H.R. 5163.●

U.S. POLICY TOWARD EL SALVADOR

HON. TOM HARKIN

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 2, 1982

● Mr. HARKIN. Mr. Speaker, today I have joined with Congressmen STUDDS and EDGAR to introduce a resolution which declares the President's certification on El Salvador null and void and stops further security assistance to that country. Last year, Congress tried to redirect the U.S. policy toward El Salvador by putting conditions on military aid to El Salvador. Congress intent was to give the administration an instrument to encourage greater respect for human rights and to call for the administration to support discussions between the Salvadoran Government and its armed opposition.

The administration did not use congressional concern as evidenced by the amendment to promote greater respect for human rights, and the human rights situation is worse. Further, the administration ignored outright the congressional requirement for unconditional discussions.

What are the American people to believe of this administration? What are they to think of the Salvadoran Government it supports? I did not expect that the administration would tell the truth in the El Salvador certification, and its comment on human rights confirmed that expectation. But I did expect that the administration would answer all the conditions set out by Congress. It did not.

The fourth condition had two parts: The first requires that the Salvadoran Government is committed to the holding of free elections. Those elections will be held in late March, and despite their narrow character, they meet the legal requirements. However, the certification went on to require that the President determine that the Government of El Salvador has also demonstrated its good faith efforts to begin discussions with all major political factions in El Salvador which have declared their willingness to find and implement an equitable political solution to the conflict, with such solution to involve a commitment to: (a) a renouncement of further military activity, and (b) the electoral process with internationally recognized observers.

The administration does not answer that second section at all. It limits its discussion solely to discussions on the elections. That is not the kind of discussions called for by the statute. The House and Senate conferees who worked out the final language very deliberately separated the issues of elections and negotiations. They recognized that discussions between the junta government and the guerrillas and their allies could never bear fruit if the only topic for negotiation was participation in the election. The FDR-FMLN very understandably is reluctant to participate in a process in which they must lay down their arms while the Salvadoran Army which has been responsible for so many bloodbaths would have no restrictions at all.

The administration should have tried to offer evidence that the junta government was willing to enter the discussions with the FDR-FMLN without conditions. It has not done so. It has deliberately ignored the mandate of the Congress. Until it responds to that condition, it is my judgment that the certification is indeed null and void and that military assistance to El Salvador is illegal. It is important to note that the diplomatic spokespersons for the armed opposition, as well as the commanders of the five armed groups themselves, have indicated repeatedly a willingness to enter into negotiations without conditions.

Misstatements—sometimes called lies—also typify the Salvadoran Government. The second condition requires that the junta government is achieving substantial control over all elements of its armed forces so as to bring an end to the indiscriminate torture and murder of Salvadorean citizens by these forces.

Recently, the Washington Post, the New York Times, and Der Spiegel have all had articles on a massacre that took place in the town of Mozote in Morazan province. Allegedly, members of the Altactl brigade killed hundreds of noncombatants, including women and children in cold-blooded murder. Our Ambassador to El Salvador, Dean Hinton, has stated that he believes something happened, although he doubts the numbers.

General Garcia, the Minister of Defense and the real strongman of El Salvador, in an interview on January 28 with UPI, stated that the reports were propaganda and that things like that do not happen in El Salvador. And then unbelievably he said: "We have absolutely no information of any military operation in Mozote."

This was an operation which involved more than 20 companies and was one of the largest ever mounted, according to Ambassador Hinton, and General Garcia denied that it even happened. It was even reported in Salvadoran newspapers. That has been the history of the Salvadoran military for over 50 years. It kills and kills and then parades out a general to deny anything ever happened.

So what we have is this: The administration does not even answer all the conditions set out by Congress, and the Salvadoran military continues to believe that it can stonewall the American people on alleged violations. I have already joined one lawsuit and I will consider joining another on the issue of certification.

CONTROL OVER ALL ELEMENTS OF ITS OWN ARMED FORCES

In trying to demonstrate that the Government of El Salvador is achieving substantial control over the army, the administration's certification states:

> Through the removal of officers, institution of a code of conduct, and command emphasis on civilian-military relations and halting abuses, the government has taken concrete steps to bring all elements of its armed forces under control.

Let me examine those assertions one at a time:

1. REMOVAL OF OFFICERS

At the time of the coup in October 1979, 60 military officers were forced into retirement. According to Col. Adolfo Majano, 40 of those had been reinstated as of last summer, 1981. In December 1980, the Salvadoran Army agreed in its negotiations with the Christian Democrats to remove immediately the Subminister of Defense, Colonel Caranza, and to remove in February 1981 Col. Francisco Moran, the chief of the Treasury Police.

Col. Nicolas Caranza was removed but then made director of communications for all El Salvador, which meant he became the de facto chief of intelligence. Colonel Moran has never been dismissed. In April 1981, 30 men, women, and teenagers were dragged from their homes in Soyopango, El Salvador, and shot by the Salvadoran Treasury Police. One member of the Foreign Affairs Committee told Colonel Moran that he should "stop handing us one My Lai after another." And what has finally happened to Colonel Moran? He was promoted this January from lieutenant colonel to full colonel.

As near as I can tell, the only military transfers that have had any meaning were those given to Colonel Majano and his followers. Colonel Majano, a member of the junta, was arrested in December 1980, detained, and then forcibly exiled. His followers were removed from command positions and in some cases left the military. What was their crime? These officers, and these officers alone, had a clear and unequivocal commitment to the observance of human rights, economic reform, and political pluralism.

2. CODE OF CONDUCT

The code of conduct is only hortatory. It has no enforcement provisions. It has no sanctions. As near as I can tell, the only punishment—rarely invoked—for rape, pillage, and murder of Salvadoran citizens by army officers is transfer to a desk job or dismissal from the service. That code of conduct is meaningless.

3. COMMAND EMPHASIS ON CIVILIAN-MILITARY RELATIONS

I am not sure what that means. But if it means that the military is going to talk to civilians instead of killing them, I know of only one tragic example. The military has set up liaison units with the peasant union, Union Comunal Salvadorena, but only after over 90 of its officials and agrarian reform promoters have been killed and only in December 1981.

4. HALTING ABUSES

This assertion is just thrown out without any effort at substantiation. The administration does not offer any hows, wheres, or whens. Rather, it goes on to make assertions about a declining level of violence and the effects of professionalization.

DECLINING LEVELS OF VIOLENCE

The certification claims "a declining level of violence over the last year and a decrease in alleged abuses by security forces. There has been a definite trend in this regard."

This statement is true in one sense, otherwise it is completely misleading. Violence was greater in January 1981—during the offensive—than in December 1981 during the holiday season. Otherwise this is what we see:

First, the figures used to justify this assertion come from U.S. Embassy estimates. These are based on newspaper accounts. Embassy personnel do not do investigations in the field for these figures.

Second, other agencies, notably the Legal Aid Office of the Archdiocese of San Salvador, show an increase in overall deaths and deaths attributable to the armed and security forces as well as paramilitary forces linked to the army. The Legal Aid Office cites 8,062 noncombatant deaths for 1980 and 12,501 for 1981, a clear increase. The Legal Aid Office bases its statistics on personal testimony from eyewitnesses. There is a bias in its methodology in that relatives of victims of violence by the guerrillas do not come forward and the Legal Aid Office does not seek out these people. The Acting Archbishop Rivera y Damas has criticized it for this failing, but notably he continues to use its figures in his homilies, including January 3 of this year.

In sum, the administration's assertion about declining levels of violence, and particularly a decrease in abuses by the security forces, is simply not true.

MILITARY PROFESSIONALIZATION

The statement goes on to speak of efforts by U.S. advisers to "increase the professionalization of the armed forces and improve the system of military discipline and command and control, thus reducing the abuses suffered in the past by the civilian population." Our Ambassador told my aide this past summer that the proof of the success of U.S. policy was the Atlactl Brigade, a rapid deployment unit trained by American advisers. He complained that reporters knew of its increased professionalism and its greater respect for human rights, but would not report it.

We have now received two reports in less than a month alleging massacres by the Atlactl Brigade in two different provinces—Cabanas and Morazan—in two different months—November and December.

Phillippe Bourgeois, an American graduate student, alleges that he witnessed a more-than-10-day attack by the Atlactl Brigade on the civilian population in areas in Cabanas. The Salvadoran troops surrounded the land area on three sides. The fourth side was a river and Honduran troops from the other side closed off egress. For more than 10 days, Bourgeois told me, the Salvadoran troops turned that area into a free fire zone using aerial bombardment—helicopters and planes—and mortars. The Human Rights Commission of El Salvador claims more than 100 were killed by the army in Cabanas during November.

Last week the New York Times and the Washington Post both carried stories on an alleged massacre in Mozote in Morazan Province, again by the Atlactl Brigade. An eyewitness told the reporters that men and women were rounded out of their homes and put in separate lines, one for women and one for men. Then, in groups of four, the men were taken away and shot. And then they began to take the women away to shoot them, too.

It is always hard to know what to believe. But I think the evidence in these cases is overwhelming and convincing. I think it shows clearly that U.S efforts to instill greater professionalism make little difference when the same army officers accustomed to using brutality and murder are still in command.

THE LAND REFORM AND THE POLITICAL CENTER

Last week the Washington Post had a long article on a report by the Union Comunal Salvadorena (UCS), the largest peasant union in El Salvador. If there is one organization in El Salvador that the American people can believe, it is the UCS. It has at least 110,000 members. It has cooperated with the Government's land reform program and given it every chance to succeed. It works with the AFL-CIO, has been advised by Americans, and has received direct and indirect U.S. Government funding.

Its conclusions about the land reform process are ominous:

The Land to the Tiller program is in danger of total collapse;

Only two of the 300 cooperatives on large estates have received titles;

25,000 families have been illegally evicted; over 90 of the union's officials and agrarian reform promoters have been killed, principally by forces in or aligned with the military;

Fewer than 15,000 of 150,000 potential beneficiaries of the Land to the Tiller program have received even provisional titles;

Upwards of 75,000 peasants have been robbed or forced to pay illegal rent payments to their former landlords;

Evictions have taken place in most cases with the assistance of the armed forces.

The report concluded that, "it will soon be beyond the capacity of the government or campesino—peasant—leadership to prevent a complete loss of faith by our country's campesinos in the agrarian reform."

This is the political center speaking. The report shows that after 1 year of the administration's policy, which purports to support the moderate center, that the latter is dying from political neglect and political assassinations. These are the cries from people who believe in the United States and who have believed that the United States shares their aspirations. We can only imagine how many of the UCS activists have abandoned the middle way and turned to the guerrillas after seeing so many of their leaders assassinated and the land reform process atrophy.

THE CERTIFICATION PROCESS

I know that some will quickly note that the UCS leadership, on the same day as the Post report, issued a letter commenting favorably on Government promises to make changes in the agrarian reform along the lines of their report. What that really points out is that the little progress that has been made has come as the direct result of Congress certification requirements and public scrutiny.

In December in consort with the final passage of the foreign aid bill, the FBI went down to El Salvador to give polygraph tests to the six national guardsmen held in connection with the death of four religious women. One of the guardsmen confessed. Last week, the Salvadoran Government arrested a former major who was involved in the kidnapping of a wealthy Salvadoran and who is said to have controlled 400 men who acted as death squads. And because of the certification and the UCS report, the UCS has finally gotten the Salvadoran Government to respond to some of their complaints.

But these are the only cases of concrete progress we can point to in El Salvador. And in my judgment, they came only as a result of the conditions imposed by Congress. One of the major issues between many of us in Congress and the administration is that the administration's reflex is to hide unpleasant facts under the rug. On the other hand, we believe that the best way to promote change in El Salvador is to expose all the ugly facts to public scrutiny and to use public opinion to encourage reform and greater respect for human rights in El Salvador.

NEW MILITARY AID

But that is not what we can expect to be the next step in administration policy. Instead, the administration has already announced an extra $55 million in military aid to El Salvador. This has not come in the form of a request to Congress for supplemental funding or a reprograming of existing funds. Instead, the President has used the authority given to him by section 506a of the Foreign Assistance Act to take from existing stocks in the Defense Department inventory and send emergency military aid to El Salvador. By announcing this aid early this week, it can arrive in El Salvador by Friday. And I should add that under existing law, Congress will not be able to stop it.

I believe that the provision of additional military aid will be tragic for El Salvador. Already by issuing the certification, which so grossly ignores past human rights violations, the administration has sent a signal to the murderous elements of the Salvadoran army that the United States does not care who they kill. Additional military aid will only strengthen this perception and further encourage them to oppose efforts for a peaceful resolution of the conflict.

Congress, therefore, has no choice but to try to cut off any further military aid in the future. We have tried with the certification process. The administration chose both to ignore the truth and outright ignore the will of the Congress. Now if Congress wants to promote greater respect for human rights in El Salvador and a peaceful and political resolution of the conflict, it must terminate all military aid.●

RICHARD BOLLING RETIREMENT

HON. JIM WRIGHT

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 28, 1982

● Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, it is with a real sense of loss that I look ahead to the retirement of my good friend, DICK BOLLING. There is no one in this great House who knows more about this institution, its history and its strengths, than does the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Rules. Ever since I arrived here in 1955, DICK BOLLING has been a major figure in the inner councils of the House leadership. His knowledge, his political intuition, and his remarkable parliamentary skills have set him apart from all other Members.

Looking back to the 1950's, I remember vividly what a close ally DICK was of my fellow Texan, Speaker Sam Rayburn. There is no doubt in my mind that one of the reasons Mr. Sam was so effective in those years was that he had the help and counsel of a few people like DICK BOLLING on many of the major issues coming before the House.

One of the most important battles in which DICK BOLLING assisted Speaker Rayburn was the effort to enlarge the Committee on Rules to make it responsive to the majority. For years that small committee of 12 members had succeeded in frustrating the will of not only the House leadership but substantial majorities of the House itself by blocking important bills ready for consideration by the membership. Twice in 1960, that committee arbitrarily denied rules for conference committee reports on bills already passed by the House. With the election of President Kennedy in 1960 Mr. Rayburn saw the need to break that iron grip which a small minority held on the flow of legislation.

A group of strategists, including especially DICK BOLLING, who was himself a member of the Rules Committee along with our present Speaker, THOMAS P. O'NEILL, JR., helped put together the campaign that resulted in enlargement and democratization of the Rules Committee on January 31, 1961. And it was DICK BOLLING, as a member of the Rules Committee in the years which followed, who often provided the parliamentary strategy that enabled the leadership of the House to move its major bills to passage.

Six years ago DICK and I were for a time competitors for the same office, that of majority leader. On the first ballot I came in third, well behind DICK. On the second ballot I somehow managed to come in second, just two votes ahead of DICK. Of course I went on to win the final ballot by one vote, entitling me to the dubious distinction of being referred to as LANDSLIDE WRIGHT.

I mention this in order to say what a gracious loser was DICK BOLLING. From that moment forward DICK has been one of my strongest and most constructive allies. My job would have been infinitely more difficult without him. I feel sure that the same is true of the job of Speaker O'NEILL.

Even though DICK did not become majority leader, even though he did not become Speaker as many thought he would in the early days of his brilliant career, he has made a mark on this institution that will remain long after he has written his last rule and led his last debate.

DICK BOLLING is and will remain a great friend of mine. Even though his years in the House of Representatives would be hard to top, it is my fervent hope that his best and happiest and most rewarding years are yet to come.

I thank the gentleman from Missouri, DICK GEPHARDT, for providing me and my colleagues an opportunity to express our admiration for this man.●

UKRAINIAN INDEPENDENCE

HON. BARBER B. CONABLE, JR.

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. CONABLE. Mr. Speaker, I join in noting the 64th anniversary of the independence of the Ukraine, home of one of the many people of Eastern Europe who are subjected unwillingly to Russian oppression. Unhappily, their independence and freedom were short-lived, overwhelmed by the Russian revolution, but we continue to see and hear evidence that the Ukrainians still seek an individual, independent identity. Certainly those who have emigrated to our country maintain their strong desire for freedom for their former homeland.

Like the Poles, the Ukrainians do not willingly accept the hegemony of the Soviet Union over their society. Like Poland, the Ukraine has a history of resisting Russian domination and seeking greater freedom and individual rights. The people struggle to maintain their culture, traditions, language, and religion. As in Poland there have been strong efforts for greater freedom for workers. I expect those efforts will continue.

The Ukraine, with 50 million people, is the largest non-Russian state in the Soviet Union or in Eastern Europe. As one of the world's most productive agricultural areas, it has an importance in world affairs even beyond its numbers. The Ukrainian people have maintained their nationalistic spirit throughout the Soviet domination. We all hope the people of the Ukraine and their supporters will draw strength from the fact that our people continue to recognize their right to freedom and self-determination and offer encouragement for their struggle.●

IMPACT OF A U.S. BOYCOTT OF LIBYAN OIL ON THE U.S. ECONOMY AND ENERGY SUPPLIES

HON. PAUL FINDLEY

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 2, 1982

● Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Speaker, because of the considerable discussion of a possible United States boycott of Libyan oil, I asked the Secretary of Energy, James Edwards, in November to provide me with an analysis of such a boycott on U.S. energy supplies and on the American economy. I would like to share Secretary Edwards' very thorough response to my inquiry with my colleagues.

U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
Washington, D.C., November 3, 1981.

Hon. JAMES B. EDWARDS,
Secretary, Department of Energy, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I would like to request an analysis by your Department of the impact of a unilateral U.S. embargo of Libyan oil on U.S. energy supplies and its overall impact on the U.S. economy. Please include in this analysis an assessment of the withdrawal of U.S. oil companies and technicians from Libya on the U.S. economy.

Would the impact on the U.S. be more or less severe should European nations such as France, Italy, or West Germany or others join in such an embargo?

What role do U.S. companies and technicians play in Libyan oil production? Could they easily be replaced by non-U.S. companies and technicians?

Since the issue of a U.S. embargo of Libyan oil is under discussion in Congress, I would appreciate this analysis as soon as possible.

With best wishes,

Sincerely yours,

PAUL FINDLEY,
Ranking Minority Member,
Subcommittee
on Europe and the Middle East.

THE SECRETARY OF ENERGY,
Washington, D.C., January 25, 1982.

Hon. PAUL FINDLEY,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. FINDLEY: This is in response to your letter of November 3, 1981, requesting the Department of Energy's analysis of the impact of a unilateral U.S. embargo of Libyan oil.

The President recently asked all U.S. companies operating in Libya to withdraw their American personnel from that country. The President's action was motivated by concern for the safety of Americans in Libya and was not intended to represent a retaliatory action for past Libyan transgressions. The withdrawal of American personnel is proceeding smoothly. The Administration will continue to reassess all of our economic, commercial and political relationships with Libya.

The effects of any U.S. embargo of Libyan oil are dependent to a very large degree on the timing of such an action. In the mid-to late 70's, Libya was our third largest supplier of crude oil, exporting to the U.S. 650,000-750,000 barrels per day. But Libyan crude had additional importance to U.S. refiners as a high quality crude producing high yields of gasoline and low sulfur products. With oil demand increasing at a healthy pace and the availability of low-sulfur crudes constrained, an embargo of oil imports from Libya probably would have had a substantial negative impact on U.S. oil supplies and as a result, the U.S. economy.

To an extent, the market would have compensated for the loss of Libyan oil through swapping arrangements to obtain similar quality crude oil. While such flexibility to restructure supply arrangements did exist in this period and realignments were continuously occurring, it is doubtful that it would have been totally efficient or carried out expeditiously on such a large scale. Under these market conditions, some U.S. refiners would undoubtedly have been stuck with inferior quality crudes forcing their costs up and leaving them with unwanted residual fuels.

A crucial factor would have been the Libyan response to an embargo. If production was shut-in, as it could have been given that Libya was producing above its revenue needs, then much of this flexibility would have been gone, thus touching off competition among consumers for available alternative supplies. In any event, irrespective of the Libyan response, a realignment on such a scale could only be accomplished at a cost which ultimately would have been passed on to the consumer in the form of higher prices.

The impact of lost crude supplies resulting from an embargo of Libya would have affected our ability to produce sufficient quantities of necessary transportation and low sulfur burner fuels. As a result, we would have expected prices to rise and dislocations of varying degrees of severity to occur. These developments would undoubtedly have had a negative impact on economic growth, employment and inflation.

Today we are in a much different situation with regard to Libya and the oil market in general and as a result the effect is likely to be different. Oil consumption in the industrialized countries has been falling over the past two years, leading to reduced demand for OPEC oil. While most producers have responded to these market developments by lowering their prices, the Libyan Government ignored market signals and overpriced its crude oil. As a consequence, demand for Libyan crude has fallen dramatically, particularly since Mid-1981, pushing production down from 1.8 million barrels per day (MMB/D) in 1980 to around 0.6 MMB/D during 3rd quarter 1981. U.S. imports of Libyan crude have fallen correspondingly from an average of 552 thousand barrels per day (MB/D) in 1980 to about 154 MB/D in September.

At the same time, the other producers of high quality crudes and Libya's principal competitors in OPEC—Nigeria and Algeria—both are producing well below capacity. Despite recent increases in Nigeria, and in Libya to a lesser extent, these three are producing 1.0-1.5 MMB/D below last year's level, creating a substantial amount of excess productive capacity for high quality low sulfur crudes. The existence of excess productive capacity extends beyond these three producers to OPEC as a whole. Current spare productive capacity in OPEC is estimated at around 4.5-5.0 MMB/D.

This confluence of circumstances—greatly diminished imports from Libya, depressed Libyan production, substantial spare productive capacity within OPEC and price stability—has reduced significantly the potentially negative effect of an embargo of Libyan oil imports and/or a withdrawal of U.S. oil companies from Libya. We, therefore, would not expect great damage to be inflicted on U.S. energy supplies or the U.S. economy from either action.

Under current circumstances, it would appear to matter little to U.S. energy supplies and the economy whether or not our European allies joined in such an embargo. In a different oil market where supplies were tight and Libya and the other producers of high quality low sulfur crudes were producing at or near capacity, participation by European countries in such an embargo could have a negative effect by tightening competition for available non-Libyan supplies. In recent months, European buyers also have reduced Libyan oil imports substantially.

Whereas circumstances have worked to lessen the impact of an embargo on oil imports from Libya on the U.S., they have had the opposite effect on Libya. With production down dramatically from last year's level, Libya's economic options in responding to an oil embargo by the U.S. at this time are limited. Revenue needs would probably preclude any further substantial production cuts, and therefore, Libya would appear to have no other choice but to discount their prices to gain a greater portion of the non-U.S. market. Libya has, in fact, recently cut its crude oil prices in an attempt to gain back some of its former market share. If it chose to do so, there is little doubt that Libya could replace the current low level of lost U.S. supplies.

Any U.S. embargo of Libyan oil imports is likely to have its greatest impact on the companies involved in producing and importing Libyan oil.

There are relatively few U.S. companies providing a large share of Libya's oil. The Oasis group (Continental, Amerada Hess, and Marathon), Occidental, Mobil, and Exxon accounted for about two-thirds of Libyan output. Much of this oil is sold to other companies, primarily in the United States and Western Europe. There are a large number of U.S. companies purchasing small amounts of Libyan oil for importation into the United States. During January to September 1981, 33 different companies and the Strategic Petroleum Reserve imported a total of 380 MB/D of Libyan oil for the U.S. market.

A cut-off of Libyan supplies would likely mean that companies would have to make other arrangements, if possible, with other producers of similar quality crudes or make spot market purchases. Given their disadvantageous position, they would likely be forced to pay higher prices for incremental volumes to make up for lost supplies. They could also experience some short-term dislocations while new supply lines are being developed. On the other hand, the importance of Libyan crude oil supplies to U.S. companies has been greatly diminished this year due to the failure of the Libyans to heed market signals in pricing their crude oil. This was clearly visible in Exxon's decision to relinquish its operations in Libya. Given the Libyan's intransigence on pricing and other problems, Exxon found it could no longer operate profitably in Libya.

American companies have had, historically, a very important role in Libyan oil production. An American oil company, ESSO, made the first oil discovery and despite an expanded role for the Libyan National Oil Company after the Qadhafi takeover, American companies are still involved in some two-thirds of Libya's oil production. The six American companies—Exxon, Mobil, Amerada Hess, Continental, Marathon, and Occidental—operate a majority of the producing fields and production facilities, providing a level of technical support which is beyond the current capabilities of the Libyans themselves. The Libyans are currently faced with the problem of finding the necessary expertise to take over the Exxon operations. It is not clear what progress the Libyans have made toward this end. In addition, other American firms are involved in exploration programs in Libya.

While the American companies are important to Libya's oil effort, they are probably not irreplaceable. Many of the Libyan oil fields are old and utilize gas or seawater lift to maintain production. In addition, some of the crude is paraffinic requiring special equipment to heat the crude so it will flow. Finding personnel experienced with production techniques utilizing gas lift may pose some difficulty for the Libyans causing disruptions in production in a number of fields. Thus, there is likely to be some production interruption should American companies pull out abruptly. But given enough time, the needed skills and technology to run the Libyan facilities probably could be acquired elsewhere at a price. The Libyan Government has already begun efforts to recruit other foreign nationals to fill the void resulting from Exxon's announced departure and from the departure of other American oil workers in response to the President's request. The promise of a long-term supply of high quality crude oil might lure foreign companies into Libya to take over the operation of oil facilities.

The Libyans appear willing to make the necessary investments to buy the expertise to run their oil industry. The time this would take and the degree of dislocation that would occur are uncertain, as is how long the Libyan Government would be able to endure an interruption of oil operations. To recover to the current low level of production could probably be done without an extended disruption. A return to former production levels in the range of 1.0-1.5 MMB/D would be more difficult and require more time.

I hope this provides you with the type of information which will facilitate your discussions of this issue. If I or my staff can be of further help to you, please let me know.

Sincerely,

JAMES B. EDWARDS.●

REPEAL THE CONGRESSIONAL PAY CEILING

HON. THOMAS A. DASCHLE

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

Tuesday, February 2, 1982

● Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. Speaker, last year a three-prong sneak attack was launched on the congressional pay ceiling which unfortunately proved to be very successful. This three-prong assault consisted of completely eliminating the ceiling on honoraria income received by Members of the Senate for speechmaking and doubling the annual honoraria income limit for Members of the House from $9,093 to $18,186; providing a permanent appropriation for annual cost-of-living increases for Members of Congress; and eliminating the previous $3,000 per year tax deduction limit for business expenses of Congressmen and Senators incurred away from home. This final provision was even perfected by Congress to provide a $75 per day deduction for each "congressional day" and eliminate the need for itemizing. By eliminating the ceiling on this deduction and providing a blanket $75 per day deduction, the allowable deduction will increase more than sixfold. The allowable deduction for Senators, for example, in 1981 will be $19,875 compared to the previous $3,000 limitation.

This assault on the congressional pay ceiling is unconscionable and indefensible. Supporters of this assault on the congressional pay ceiling argue the salaries of executives in the private sector have increased by 116 percent, not including bonuses and fringe benefit increases, since 1969 and the hourly earnings index has increased by more than 130 percent since 1969, while Members of Congress have received a 43-percent increase in pay since 1969. If an increase in congressional pay is so defensible, why then has Congress resorted to repeated sneak attacks on the pay ceiling?

Members of Congress are paid $60,622.50 per year and they will be among the primary beneficiaries of the tax bill approved by Congress last year because they are among the 4 percent of the taxpayers earning more than $50,000 who will receive 32 percent of the tax relief contained in the administration's tax plan. This sneak attack on the congressional pay ceiling is indefensible. Farm income is now at depression levels. The rate of unemployment today is 8.9 percent. More than 9,400,000 American workers are officially classified as being unemployed. More than 1 million additional unemployed Americans have given up all hope of finding gainful employment and are not included in the unemployed statistic. More businesses failed last year than in any year since 1933. A $20,000 tax handout and a guaranteed annual pay raise to Members of Congress under these circumstances is reprehensible.

I am today introducing legislation to flatly repeal the three congressional pay-increasing provisions which Congress has approved and I urge the speedy consideration and passage of this legislation.●

THE 34TH ANNIVERSARY OF SRI LANKA'S INDEPENDENCE

HON. FREDERICK W. RICHMOND

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 2, 1982

● Mr. RICHMOND. Mr. Speaker, on February 4, 1982, the resplendent land, Sri Lanka, will celebrate the 34th anniversary of its independence. As one who has visited this beautiful nation, I have a keen interest in and great affection for Sri Lanka, a country blessed with fertile lands, lovely beaches, and a delightful climate.

I am sure that my colleagues will be interested in knowing more about this successful, democratic nation and reviewing Sri Lanka's many social and economic achievements.

Following are excerpts from an aide memoire I received from the Ambassador of Sri Lanka, Ernest Corea, outlining the progress and promise of Sri Lanka:

AIDE MEMOIRE—DEMOCRATIC SOCIALIST REPUBLIC OF SRI LANKA, NATIONAL DAY, FEBRUARY 4, 1982

On February 4th 1948 Sri Lanka regained her independence from the British, the last of three nations that had colonised her over the preceding four centuries, the others being the Portuguese (1505-1658), and the Dutch (1658-1796).

Since 1948 seven general elections have been held in Sri Lanka and as the result of six of these elections the government in power has been defeated and the major opposition party (either by itself or in coalition with other parties) has been voted into power. Sri Lanka has a multi party system. Over the past sixteen years voter turnout at general elections has averaged over 80 percent.

The year 1981 marked the 50th Anniversary of the granting of universal adult franchise in the modern political history of the nation. Although the experience and practice of adult franchise existed in Sri Lanka even in historic times, this was only at the local level of government; the government at the national level was monarchical. In 1931 elections were held at the national level on the basis of universal adult franchise for the first time. Since then all elections in the country have been held on this basis. Today, every citizen of the country over the age of 18 years has a vote.

Women in Sri Lanka have always actively participated in politics. The first general election held on the basis of universal adult franchise in 1931 also saw a woman elected to the national legislature which was then called the State Council.

From 1948 till 1972 Sri Lanka, while being an independent nation, still retained, in common with certain other nations, the British monarch as Head of State. On May 22nd 1972 a Republican constitution was adopted by which the Governor-General, who had represented the British Monarch, was replaced by a titular President nominated by the elected Head of Government (the Prime Minister). This constitution setup a unicameral legislature instead of the bicameral one that had hitherto existed. It also changed the name of the country back from Ceylon to its traditional and historic name, Sri Lanka.

Mr. J. R. Jayewardene, under whose leadership the United National Party had been returned to office in July 1977 had consistently campaigned for the establishment of an executive Presidential system. Such a constitution was promulgated on February 4, 1978. It draws from the constitutional practices of the United States, France and Britain, adapting them to the needs and aspirations of Sri Lanka and her people. Sovereignty of the people is exercised through Parliament which has been declared supreme. Legislative power is vested in Parliament. The President has no right of veto over legislation passed in Parliament. There is strict separation of powers between the legislature, the executive and the judiciary.

A further development in the political structure of the country has been the setting up of District Development Councils in each of the 24 districts of the country. The purpose of these councils is to provide for greater participation at the district or regional level in the development of the country, within the framework of the efforts of the national government. These councils consist of members elected specifically to them and the Member of Parliament in the district. Their functions include the approval and implementation of an annual development plan and the raising of certain local revenues and the disposition of funds under their control. The first election to the District Development Councils was held on June 4th 1981.

Sri Lanka has, living within its area of 25,000 square miles, a variety of ethnic groups (Sinhalese, Tamils, Moors, Burghers, Parsis) who are adherents of almost an equal variety of religious beliefs (Buddhists, Hindus, Muslims, Christians, Zoroastrians). The guarantee of fundamental rights and equal opportunities to all citizens is given by the constitution where the chapter on fundamental rights embodies all 30 clauses contained in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights on the United Nations.

In foreign affairs, Sri Lanka has chosen to follow a policy of strict non-alignment. Both in the 95 member non-aligned movement of which she was Chairman from 1976 to 1979 and also in the UN, of which she is a member, she bases her actions and initiatives on the principles established at Bandung in 1955 and on the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations. Her consistent aim has been to work within this framework towards the furtherance of reconciliation among nations, the peaceful settlement of disputes among them, and the evolution of an international milieu where nations of diverse ideological persuations could move together towards the betterment of the lot of all nations and peoples, and particularly the underprivileged.

Since 1948 Sri Lanka has pursued a domestic policy of betterment of the lot of her population both through the provision of basic needs and through the stimulation of economic growth. Basic needs support measures in the field of health, education and food coupled with a strong family planning programme have helped evolve a healthy, literate and educated people. Life expectancy is 64 years for males and 67 years for females; the death rate is 8.1 per 1,000; the literacy rate is 88 percent. The quality of life has been rated high and set at 83 on a scale of 100. With the gradual improvement of the lot of her people the government has been able to phase out some of these support measures. However, Sri Lanka's earnings have been and still are inadequate to meet the needs of development, being vulnerable to price movements in international commodity markets. So, although successive governments have addressed themselves to the problem of economic development, its solution still has eluded them.

The present government, which came into power in 1977, has focused sharply on economic development as a major commitment of its programme. It has approached the question in two main areas—agricultural self-sufficiency and the production of adequate power through the Mahaweli Development Programme, and the attraction of foreign investment for industrial development, mainly through the setting up of Free Trade Zones.

In the first stage of development of the Mahaweli Programme five dams are to be constructed and land opened for agriculture with financial assistance from a consortium of countries comprising the United States, Canada, Britain, the Federal Republic of Germany, Sweden, and Japan together with the World Bank and the IDA. This stage is expected to irrigate around 117,000 hectares of land and generate around 500 megawatts of power.

In the area of industrial development, the initial period of decontrol and deregulation in the economic fields soon after the present government came into power, cleared the way for the entry of foreign investment, both within the Free Trade Zones and outside them. One Free Trade Zone has been parceled out and a second is being created. Attracted by the package of tax and other incentives and the complete infrastructure facilities given, 40 industrial enterprises are already manufacturing and exporting goods while 16 others have factories in various stages of construction. Among the goods exported are garments, rubberthread, hair dryers, fishing gear and jewelery. Among eight projects recently approved are leatherware, kitchen appliances, electronic devices and PVC containers.

The period from 1978 to 1980 has also seen 11 new foreign banks and credit companies given permission to operate in Sri Lanka on an offshore basis. They comprise four from the United States (Chase Manhattan, Bank of America, Citibank, and American Express), three from the Arab World (BCCI, Bank of Oman, and Bank of Dubai), three from Europe (Algemene Bank Netherland, Indo-Suez, and European Asian) and one from Hong Kong (Overseas Trust Bank).

In the field of trade too, the pattern of imports has shown an emphasis on development. Imports of intermediate goods has risen from 38 percent of total imports in 1978 to 40.5 percent in 1979. Imports of investment goods has risen from 23 percent of total imports in 1978 to 24 percent in 1979. Both these categories are essential for development. By contrast, imports of consumer goods has fallen from 38 percent of total imports in 1978 to 34 percent in 1979. The comparison becomes that more forceful when one considers that the value of imports in these three categories, in terms of SDR's has grown from 744 million in 1978 to 1114 million in 1979.

This trend continues. In 1980 imports of intermediate goods rose to 46 percent of total imports, investment goods remained at the same level as 1979 and imports of consumer goods declined further to 29.4 percent. The total imports in all three categories in terms of SDR's rose to 1557.6 million.

The objective of all these efforts is to endeavour to ensure that the gains of the country in the fields of political development and awareness, education, health and other basic needs are consolidated by the creation of adequate economic opportunity for her people. For it is only by doing this that Sri Lanka can enhance the quality of life of her people, promote human rights and enrich and stabilise her democratic institutions.●

THE BAIL REFORM ACT OF 1982

HON. LEO C. ZEFERETTI
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 2, 1982

● Mr. ZEFERETTI. Mr. Speaker, today I have introduced the Bail Reform Act of 1982. This bill introduces two important changes to our present system of pretrial release.

The first is to give Federal judicial officers the discretion to detain, prior to trial, those defendants who present a danger to the community or to particular individuals; those defendants who would obstruct justice or intimidate witnesses; or those defendants who are likely to flee prosecution.

I believe it is essential that judges have the latitude to identify dangerous criminal defendants and remove them from the streets prior to trial. Recently, arguments were heard in the Supreme Court in a case of this nature. In Murphy against Hunt, the Court was faced with the validity of a recent Nebraska constitutional amendment that denied bail to anyone accused of forcible rape when the evidence against that person is great. This amendment was passed in 1979 after a brutal rape-murder was committed by a man released on bail after pleading guilty to a previous sexual assault. Public outrage in Nebraska led to the enactment of this measure.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that the American people expect no less protection in the Federal judicial system. Under this proposal that I have just introduced courts are mandated to take into account the danger to the community or to any person in setting pretrial release conditions.

For those defendants who do not present a danger and are not likely to flee prior to trial, the court would be permitted to release these defendants on their own recognizance. However, if such release is insufficient to assure the safety of the community or reappearance of the defendant in court, then the court must set one or more of the following conditions: Remain in the custody of a designated person for supervision; maintain or actively seek employment; maintain or start an educational program; abide by specific restrictions on personal associations, place of abode, or travel; avoid contact with the victim and witnesses of the alleged offense; report to designated authorities on a regular basis; comply with a specified curfew; refrain from possessing dangerous weapons; refrain from alcohol and drug use; undergo designated medical or psychiatric treatment; forfeit designated property upon failure to comply with conditions of release; and return to custody for specified hours following release for employment, schooling, or other appropriate purpose.

For offenses involving crimes of violence, offenses for which the maximum sentence is life imprisonment or death, offenses involving a controlled substance for which a maximum term of imprisonment of 10 or more years is prescribed and in cases that involve a serious risk that the defendant will flee or obstruct justice, the court must hold a hearing to determine whether any condition or combination of conditions will reasonably assure the appearance of the person as required and assure the safety of any other person or the community. If not, the court is empowered to detain the defendant prior to trial.

Careful due process considerations are built into the hearing procedure. The right to counsel is guaranteed as well as the right of confrontation and to offer evidence. Continuances are tightly limited and the testimony of the defendant offered at the bail hearing is not admissible on the issue of his guilt at trial. Pretrial detention can only be imposed upon the court's finding, after the hearing, that there is a substantial probability that the defendant committed the offense charged.

The second important feature of this bill is the elimination of money bail and surety bonds as conditions of release. The traditional system of money bail breaks down when dealing with narcotics cases. The Select Committee on Narcotics, which I chair, has heard of countless cases of major narcotics traffickers who can post unheard of amounts of bail and then flee the jurisdiction or continue to traffic. Under the provisions of my bill, courts would have clear authority to detain such individuals prior to trial.

In addition, the continued use of money bail discriminates against the poor who often can not post what many would consider to be a reasonable amount of bail. As a result, many individuals are detained prior to trial because they cannot raise bail even though they are neither likely to flee nor pose a danger to the community. This is an unacceptable situation. There is substantial evidence showing that court-fashioned conditions of release are more effective to assure the appearance of a defendant for trial and community safety.

In lieu of money bail, courts should be given specific statutory authority to require a defendant, as a condition of release, to deposit with the court title to or control over designated property belonging to the defendant or any other person. This property would be subject to forfeiture if the defendant fails to comply with any conditions of release. Testimony received by the select committee indicates that a property bond posted by family or friends is more effective than money bail in deterring flight.

As chairman of the Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control, I urge my colleagues to give this proposal the most serious consideration. This proposal will give our courts the ability to protect the community from dangerous criminal defendants and bring fairness and equity to the existing bail system through the elimination of money bail.●

IMPACTS OF REDUCTIONS IN FORCE

HON. FRANK R. WOLF

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 2, 1982

● Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, on January 26, 1982, I testified before the Subcommittee on Manpower and Housing of the House Government Operations Committee which is holding hearings to examine the impact of reductions in force. As a Member of Congress who represents a tremendous number of Federal employees, I appreciated the opportunity to present my views on this issue of vital concern not only to me, but to my constituents. As a former executive branch employee as well as a representative of many RIF'ed employees, I know all to well of the debilitating effects on employees of even the rumor of RIF's, let alone the actual RIF itself. I would like to submit my statement of those views into the RECORD at this time.

STATEMENT OF HON. FRANK R. WOLF

Madam Chairwoman, you should be commended for calling these hearings to examine how well our government is doing in the effort to minimize the impact of reductions-in-force (RIF's) on federal employees. As someone who has been an executive branch employee and as a Member of Congress who represents a tremendous number of federal employees, I want to thank you for focusing the spotlight of Congressional attention on this problem. I appreciate the opportunity to present my views here this morning.

During my tenure as an employee of the Department of Interior I became aware of the concern about reductions-in-force. Unless you have been at an agency during a RIF it is hard to imagine the anxiety, disruption and loss of productivity that results from even the rumor that a RIF may occur. Every employee, no matter how essential or qualified becomes fearful that he or she may lose his or her job. A RIF can cause paralysis at an agency.

I have been particularly distressed about the use of reductions-in-force as a means of cutting costs during this time of budget cutbacks. Certainly, a variety of other personnel actions such as hiring freezes, early retirements, liberal use of voluntary leave without pay or flexible work schedules and furloughs are far less disruptive to agency operations than a reduction-in-force. Whenever possible, use of reductions-in-force should be avoided. A RIF should be the very last option considered by an agency head that is seeking to reduce costs.

When an agency resorts to a reduction-in-force, it has an obligation to its employees to make every effort to minimize the impact of that RIF. President Reagan said it well in his August 5, 1981 memo to heads of executive departments and agencies concerning RIF's: "Assisting Federal employees who are facing the loss of their jobs is a government-wide imperative."

As you know, a number of highly qualified and dedicated federal workers are now or will soon face a reduction-in-force. Through no fault of their own, these people are the innocent victims of a dramatic change in government policy. Because of this fact, I believe that the Administration has a special obligation to provide the maximum amount of assistance and counseling to help place RIFed employees in productive jobs either within the government or the private sector. To repeat, it is "a government-wide imperative."

While many departments and agencies have established out-placement programs, maintain Reemployment Priority Lists (RPL) and have encouraged their employees to participate in the Voluntary Inter-agency Placement Program (VIPP), the Displaced Employees Program (DEP) and the Federal Employees Re-Employment Registry (FERR), I am concerned that some agencies are not aggressive enough in helping RIFed workers.

During the past year, my office has worked with federal employees faced with reductions-in-force. In addition, I have conducted an intensive review of this problem and have spoken to a number of federal employees and agency heads. From the experience we have gained, it is apparent that there are weaknesses in the present effort to help RIFed employees.

First, as a general rule neither the Office of Personnel Management (OPM) nor the agencies are sufficiently creative or aggressive in helping workers who face a reduction-in-force. The services that are provided are largely referral programs which lack adequate counseling and personal attention. In some cases, information that would be helpful to RIFed workers is not reaching them. Many out-placement coordinators have little or no training or experience and few of the industry contacts necessary to actively help individuals pursue positions. Most are personnel officers who are far more accustomed to hiring than placing people. Some agencies have continued to hire new employees from outside government when apparently qualified candidates that were being RIFed were available within the same department.

Second, the method by which a reduction-in-force notice is given does not always provide employees enough time to adjust to their new status. The use of general notices thirty days before a final action followed by a specific notice five days before a RIF creates unnecessary concern among some workers and eliminates meaningful notice for those who need it.

Third, not enough is being done to deal with a widespread misconception which exists in the private sector about the quality of the federal workforce. Many in the private world do not believe that the federal worker is capable and hard-working. The resulting stigma presents a barrier federal workers must overcome when seeking non-government jobs.

While out-placement programs government-wide generally could be improved, some agencies are doing a good job. I want to make you aware of one office that is working especially hard to avoid using a reduction-in-force.

The Office of Noise Abatement Control at the Environmental Protection Agency headquarters has not been funded for Fiscal Year 1983. To date the office has placed 57 out of its 92 employees and has yet to issue the first RIF notice. The management of this office made a commitment to its employees to help them find new employment.

The advantages of this effort to the government are several. First, morale of the office is high. The employees do not feel abandoned and alone and they recognize that the RIF they may face does not reflect on their worth as individuals. Second, there will be a potentially substantial savings to the taxpayers. For those employees who are placed the government will reduce expenses related to severance pay, payout of accrued annual leave and unemployment compensation. The withdrawal of employees' contributions from the federal retirement program should be reduced. Third, the office is not paralyzed. It continues to function and provide a product even though it is phasing out.

The key to the success of the out-placement program in this office is the commitment to help their employees on the part of management. The Office of Noise Abatement Control has formed a task force which meets regularly and actively pursues jobs for the office's workers.

In December, I met with OPM Director Donald Devine to urge a much more significant effort be made to help federal employees who are RIFed.

Ultimately, it is the amount of commitment and effort on the part of each department and agency head that will determine whether government out-placement programs will be successful. In my view, a high degree of commitment must be dedicated to this effort. With such a commitment the government when it must resort to a reduction-in-force can satisfy its special obligation to assist RIFed employees.

It is because I believe there is a general need to strengthen the commitment to helping RIFed workers that these hearings are important. I intend to continue to do all I can to help federal employees who may be faced with a reduction-in-force.

Again, thank you for the opportunity to testify today.●

TRIBUTE TO DICK BOLLING

HON. G. V. (SONNY) MONTGOMERY

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 28, 1982

● Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, I regret I was unable to be present last week to join with the large number of my colleagues who rose to pay special tribute to DICK BOLLING, whom we will all sorely miss after this year when he retires.

For 17 terms, DICK BOLLING has been the conscience of the Congress and I can think of no person of greater honesty, integrity and fairness to serve in this role. His knowledge and understanding of how the Congress operates and his eternal desire to improve on how the Congress operates will be the hallmark of DICK's service to the people of Missouri and America.

As we all know, Mr. Speaker, DICK BOLLING was a man of few words, but he made each word he spoke count. He always had the ability to get to the heart of every issue without the political rhetoric that too often abounds in this Chamber. When DICK spoke, his colleagues listened because they knew that his words were based on extensive knowledge and experience.

One tribute to DICK that has probably gone unnoticed by many Members is that DICK BOLLING was always the person to whom the Speaker would turn to serve as Chairman of the Committee of the Whole whenever a tough and controversial bill was being debated because the Speaker knew the gentleman from Missouri would keep the debate moving and at the same time be unfailingly fair to both the opponents and proponents. DICK BOLLING knew no other way than to have a full and fair debate.

Mr. Speaker, the State of Missouri has produced many outstanding public servants such as President Truman, Champ Clark and Clarence Cannon. Right at the top of that list will be the name of DICK BOLLING. I consider it a privilege to have served with DICK and wish him the best in the future. We are all better for having had him pass our way.●

RUSSIANS BOMB FRENCH HOSPITALS IN AFGHANISTAN

HON. LARRY McDONALD

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 2, 1982

● Mr. McDONALD. Mr. Speaker, Soviet efforts to crush Afghanistan into conformity with its wishes daily grow more barbaric. In addition to chemical warfare and indiscriminate bombing of civilians, the Soviets have now stooped to bombing of clearly marked hospital facilities, specifically those run by a French organization called Medecins Sans Frontiers—Doctors Without Frontiers. This is yet another indication of the desperation on the part of the Soviets to crush all opposition and also their lack of observance of rules agreed to in the Geneva Convention regarding war, if more proof were needed. The item from the Daily Telegraph of London for January 21, 1982, follows:

RUSSIANS BOMB FRENCH HOSPITALS IN AFGHANISTAN

(By Michael Field)

The Russians are now bombing hospitals in Afghanistan operated by French medical teams and trying to kill doctors, it was claimed yesterday in Paris.

Slides were shown of Russian ground attacks and the civilian casualties of boobytraps.

"We thought the Russians had no objection to our bringing medical care to the Afghan population provided we did not publicise what was happening in the country.

"But now we realise from the kind of bombardments we have witnessed that the hospitals are being systematically bombed to try to drive us out of the country and kill some of us," said Dr. C. Malhuret of "Medecins san Frontiers" (Doctors without Frontiers).

Bombing of the hospitals by Russian helicopter gunships and Mig jet fighter-bombers began last November.

The doctors think that this marks a change of tactics by the Russians. "This is not a war of pacification, but a war of terror against the civilian population," said Dr. Malhuret.

ROCKET ATTACK

Dr. Arnaud Bourde described in detail the bombing of a hospital at Jaghori, more than 100 miles from Kabul in the central Hazarajat region. The hospital building was outside the village and clearly marked.

"On Oct. 27 last year, a Russian helicopter flew over at treetop level. I took shelter with people from the hospital under some rocks.

"After hovering over the hospital, the pilot, a Russian, changed course and came towards us. He could see us and fired rockets straight at us," Dr. Bourde said.

Nine days later at 7 a.m., three helicopters returned and destroyed the now empty hospital. He showed slides of it before and after the attack when it was reduced to rubble.

Dr. Philippe Hamey described a similar attack on a house used as a hospital in the Panshir valley in northern Afghanistan.

SLIDES OF DESTRUCTION

Among the slides were several of Yakaolang, 25 miles north of Panjao, in Hazarajat region wherein Russian ground attacks involving 300 tanks, systematic destruction of crops, bazaars and villages had taken place.

The American-built hospital was completely sacked, medicines strewn on the ground and stamped on equipment removed, and parts which could not be taken simply smashed. It had once boasted a modern ophthalmic clinic.

The doctors showed slides of terrible injuries caused by "toy" bombs and boobytrap devices scattered in the countryside by the Russians. "Most of our surgery is patching up victims of these bombs," they said.●

FEDERAL PROCUREMENT REFORM AND SMALL BUSINESS

HON. NICHOLAS MAVROULES

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 2, 1982

● Mr. MAVROULES. Mr. Speaker, today, I am filing with 18 of my colleagues the Small Business Reform Act.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that many of my colleagues can fully appreciate the degree to which existing Federal procurement policies discriminate against small business. In addition, there exists major obstacles that must overcome in order to do business with the Federal Government. It is our hope that this bill go far toward surmounting some of these obstacles and help our small business community during a most difficult time.

Today, small business is operating in an oppressive environment. The current recession has caused interest rates to rise to unbearably high levels, affecting capital formation opportunities and inflation has eroded the return on business investment. While small business has the proven capacity to be successful at doing things that big business cannot, this creative and competitive edge is being blunted by economic forces it has no way of controlling.

The survival of small business is at stake, and continuing widespread failures are a prospect that the general economy can ill afford. This Nation's 13 million small business firms provide about 48 percent of all business output, 55 percent of all private employment, 50 percent of all business activity, and 43 percent of the gross national product. In addition, reliable studies show that small business develops new jobs at a rate 66 times faster than large companies and is responsible for more than half of the inventions in the United States.

Small businesses are an important partner in our economy, yet they are being denied from playing a full and active role in our economic recovery. The Federal Government must provide the necessary direction here. One way is to reform the cumbersome Federal procurement practices. Today, only about 20 percent out of every Federal dollar the Government spends to purchase goods or services is directed toward small business, and that share is shrinking. In 1978 small business received 21.7 percent of the Federal procurement budget. In 1980, that figure dropped to 20.1 percent.

As a member of the Armed Services Committee, I represent a number of small businesssmen who have expressed their lack of participation in defense contracts. Some have stated that they are not interested because of the difficulty in doing business with the Federal Government. Too frequently, it seems that the Government's procurement process and practices discourage rather than encourage participation by small firms.

In an attempt to remedy this situation and increase small businesses' share in Government's $100 billion purchasing budget, I have introduced the Small Business Procurement Reform Act.

Allow me to outline what this bill would accomplish: Guarantee that firms have at least 45 days to bid on each contract, thus protecting small companies, which are often the last to hear of new contract opportunities; require that each Federal agency work toward a goal of at least 35 percent small business participation in its procurement activities; direct each agency to break its large systems procurement, whenever practical, into smaller components in order to give small businesses a greater opportunity to submit bids; require that, for a contract under $100,000, each agency provide to interested firms a copy of a summary of every Federal law and regulation with which they must comply in the performance of the contract; require that each Federal agency justify every instance in which goods or services are procured without competitive bids or when bidding is restricted to a certain region of the United States; require that information and material needed to prepare bids on Federal contracts be made available in a timely manner; authorize the Small Business Administration to establish arbitration panels to resolve minor contractual disputes, thus avoiding lengthy and costly litigation.

At this time, on this day when the bill is being filed, 19 Members of this body recognize the need for reform in our Federal procurement process. I would hope that many more of our colleagues would join in support of this measure and ask for a full airing of this critically important economic issue.●

THE GROWTH OF C-SPAN

HON. ROBERT H. MICHEL

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 2, 1982

● Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, this week marks a significant step in the growth of C-SPAN, the Cable-Satellite Public Affairs Network. Since television coverage of our daily proceedings began, the cable television industry has brought floor debates into millions of homes across the country. C-SPAN has provided the House floor debates in their entirety—gavel-to-gavel, uncut, unedited, and live.

Now C-SPAN has expanded its programing day to put Government in prime time. Beginning this week, C-SPAN offered its full range of public affairs programing 16 hours a day. Of special significance to the Members of the House is that our daily sessions can now be seen in their entirety during the evening hours, when Americans have returned home after work. Those 10.5 million cable subscribers who receive C-SPAN will also be able to watch committee hearings of the House and of the other body. The coverage of committee activities is a great milestone as far as I am concerned because the media seldom cover them. When they do, the coverage is often times for dramatic effect only.

I am sure my colleagues join me in welcoming our new evening audience and in congratulating C-SPAN on its progress in actually bringing Government closer to the people.●

VOTING RECORD

HON. MORRIS K. UDALL

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 2, 1982

● Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, it has become my practice from time to time to list my votes in the House of Representatives here in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I strongly believe that the people of southern Arizona have the right to know where I stand on the issues decided by the House, and I have found that printing my record here is the best way to provide that information.

This is not an all-inclusive list. I have omitted noncontroversial votes such as quorum calls, motions to resolve into the Committee of the Whole House, and motions to approve the Journal of the previous day.

The descriptions are necessarily somewhat short, and I am sure that some of my constitutents will have additional questions about the issues described here. So I invite them to write me for specifics, or to visit my district office at 300 North Main, Tucson.

The list is arranged as follows:

KEY

1. Official rollcall number;
2. Number of the bill or resolution;

ARLINGTON MAN PROVIDES RAY OF HOPE TO SURVIVORS OF AIR FLORIDA FLIGHT 90

HON. FRANK R. WOLF

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 2, 1982

● Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, one of my constituents from Arlington, Va., Mr. Roger Olian, has been somewhat overlooked as one of the heroes of the Air Florida crash of January 13. Yet his fingers are still numb from his 30-minute swim into the freezing Potomac River to try to rescue some of the five people clinging for life on the Boeing 737's tail section. He did not rescue anyone physically; but emotionally, his courage helped to give the handful of survivors the courage, the hope, and the will to live and hang onto life.

I believe that Roger Olian deserves a place among our Nation's heroes—our Nation's finest.

Those of us in Virginia's 10 District are particularly proud to have Roger Olian among us—to inspire us all to the noblest vocation of all—the service of humankind.

I ask that the text of an article by Mike Schwartz which appeared in the Friday, January 29, edition of the Northern Virginia Sun be printed at this point in the RECORD.

[From the Northern Virginia Sun, Jan. 29, 1982]

RISK, HOPE, FULFILLMENT: OLIAN AND SKUTNIK HONORED AS HEROS

ARLINGTON.—Roger Olian and Lenny Skutnik were honored Thursday with an awards ceremony in the National Hospital for Orthopedics and Rehabilitation, the hospital in which the majority of the five survivors of Air Florida Flight 90 were nursed back to health after the crash of Jan. 13.

Standing before the bright lights of four television cameras and shaking hands with several politicians, they received the key to the city of Alexandria, a certificate of appreciation from the Arlington County Board and a Cross pen desk set from the Arlington Chamber of Commerce.

Olian, 34, of Arlington, and Skutnik, 28, of Lorton, appeared uncomfortable with the fuss and said few words. When asked to say something, Olian, a federal sheet metal worker at St. Elizabeth's Hospital, said he was not much of a public speaker.

"I think I'd rather jump back in the river than speak," Olian said to a laughing audience "You've all been real generous and real kind to me and thank you." Olian, who had been somewhat overlooked in the hero category, swam into the freezing Potomac River to try to rescue some of the five people clinging to the Boeing 737's tail section.

The 30-minute swim has left him with hands that are still somewhat numb, his wife Donna said. He did not rescue anyone physically, but emotionally he helped give the few survivors some courage and hope.

Clad in green work clothes and wearing a blue pullover cap and a big smile, Olian said he had the opportunity to talk with Joseph Stiley, of Alexandria, one of the survivors of the crash that killed 78 people. Olian said Stiley told him the effort by Olian "helped him hold on."

Olian said Stiley, in a wheelchair with two broken legs, told him when they met before yesterday's ceremony that Stiley thought maybe he would try to swim after seeing Olian. "He said I saved his life . . . that was nice," Olian said.

Bert Hamilton, of Gaithersburg, thanked Olian. Hamilton said he was on the other side of the tail section and was afraid no one would see him. "It was a very courageous thing you did," he said to Olian.

Skutnik, when asked to say something, said, "It's an honor."

Grotos, who noted Olian's Arlington residency, said he and Olian "without any thought for personal safety or awards and dinners," jumped in the river to meet a human need. She said their efforts help buttress the belief that "man is innately good."

"Your deeds spoke far more than any words could say," Grotos said.

Since the crash and his rescue effort, Olian has received letters from various federal government officials, including Drew Lewis, secretary of transportation. But unlike Lenny Skutnik, he was not invited to sit next to the First Lady while President Reagan gave his State of the Union address in the House Chamber.

Instead, Olian was sitting home.●

WALL STREET JOURNAL OPPOSES NEW WITHHOLDING TAX

HON. NORMAN E. D'AMOURS

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 2, 1982

● Mr. D'AMOURS. Mr. Speaker, in its editorial of January 29, 1982, the Wall Street Journal has eloquently put forth the case against the President's proposal to require a new 5-percent withholding tax on interest and dividends. As the editorial notes, this new withholding tax is nothing more than an expensive and burdensome substitute for better IRS computers to track down nonreporting of interest and dividend income.

I would like to share this incisive editorial with my colleagues and urge them to cosponsor, House Concurrent Resolution 255, legislation I have introduced to express the sense of the Congress that no new withholding tax should be imposed on interest and dividends. The full text of House Concurrent Resolution 255 appears on page E 156 of the January 29 edition of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Members who wish to cosponsor House Concurrent Resolution 255 should call Mike Radway or Jeff Lawrence at 5-5456.

The text of the Wall Street Journal editorial follows:

[From the Wall Street Journal, Jan. 29, 1982]

WITHHOLDING FLIMFAM

In an effort to puff up revenue projections for the February 8 budget message, the Treasury Department is proposing a 5% withholding tax on dividend and interest income. The proposal makes no economic sense, and hasn't a ghost's chance of passage through Congress, something the Treasury must surely have known.

After all, we've been down this track many times before. Similar withholding tax proposals have been rebuffed in Congress in 1942, 1943, 1950, 1951, and 1962. On an appropriations rider in August 1980, the House of Representatives voted by 401-to-four to prevent the Internal Revenue Service from even studying the idea of a withholding tax on interest and dividends. This year's proposal is opposed by powerful members of the President's own party, including Representative Barber B. Conable Jr., ranking Republican on the House Ways and Means Committee, who says the committee won't approve the measure.

And with good reason. For fairly minimal gains in revenues—Treasury is estimating an extra $2 billion for fiscal 1983, less afterwards—a withholding tax would impose heavy paperwork burdens on banks, savings and loans and brokerages, among others. In a study commissioned for the American Bankers Association, the accounting firm Arthur Young & Co. estimated that the Carter administration's 1980 withholding proposals would cost a bank with $100 million in deposits roughly $200,000 in startup costs and $80,000 in annual operating costs.

A withholding tax on interest and dividends, moreover, would lower the effective yield on savings and stock ownership. And many of the withholding payments would most likely be drawn from interest-bearing accounts. At a time of enormous fear of "crowding out" by government borrowing in the capital markets, it makes no sense to reduce the deficit by reducing personal saving.

The IRS says it needs a withholding tax to prevent underreporting of interest and dividend income. But what it really means is that its computer programs and management are so sloppy that it can't match interest and dividend reports filed by corporations and banks with individual tax returns. The answer is for the IRS to put its own house in order, rather than to transfer an enormous administrative burden to the private sector.

Since the withholding measure has little hope of passage, its major purpose is to allow the Treasury to pretend that it will be collecting $2 billion more next year than it actually will. The window dressing wasn't worth the cost in budget credibility.●

RECIPROCITY

HON. BILL FRENZEL

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 2, 1982

● Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, legislation to establish "reciprocity" in international trade is very popular in Congress now. Unemployment, recession, and impatience with a relatively closed Japanese market have all caused Members to look for legislative remedies to some of our worst domestic problems.

Proponents of reciprocity legislation believe the United States should treat imports of a particular product from any country the same way exports of the same U.S. product are treated in that country. To many people, that sounds like "fair trade". Actually, all the countries of the world have tried to protect certain favored industries with higher tariffs, and to negotiate lower tariffs in other countries for the products they would like to export.

Each country has a different pattern of its own tariffs it wants to keep up, and of the tariffs of other countries it would like to lower. Tariff negotiations always involve lowering on both sides, but usually different goods and services are involved.

Direct reciprocity is not necessarily a practical solution because different countries want to sell, and to protect, different items.

Nor is country-by-country reciprocity necessarily a practical solution, either. Trade balances tend to swing back and forth over the years. Lesser developed countries typcially run large trade deficits with industrialized countries. Oil-producing countries typically run large surpluses with everybody. We run a huge deficit with Japan, and nearly as large a surplus with Europe.

The theory of international trade is not that every nation have a bilateral balance with every other nation. And it is surely not necessary that every product balance with every product. The theory of corporative advantage is based on accessability, not reciprocity.

The following editiorial from the February 1 Journal of Commerce explains all this more clearly than I can. It also stresses that reciprocity legislation, however nobly motivated, willneed the close scrutiny of Congress, lest it hamstrings our own efforts to improve exports.

Even though we trade a relatively small portion of our GNP, we are the world's largest trader. Therefore, we bear the largest exposure to risk from unwise trade legislation. Our risk can be reduced if our focus is shifted from reciprocity to accessibility.

[From the Journal of Commerce, Feb. 1, 1982]

AN EYE FOR AN EYE?

There has been enough talk around Washington about the concept of reciprocity in trade to worry our major trading partners. On a sectoral basis, reciprocity in trade would mean the United States should treat foreign telecommunication exports and investments, for example, in the same way the foreign government treats U.S. telecommunication exports and investments.

Even though reciprocity is not the administration's avowed policy, the Canadians are taking the hints seriously and have decided to take the bull by the horns. Allan E. Gottlieb, the Canadian ambassador to the United States, attacked the idea of reciprocity. He warns reciprocity will lead to more, not less, protectionism and "to a return to the beggar-thy-neighbor approach to trade of the great depression."

With protectionism on the rise abroad, theoretically reciprocity is appealing. If you can't get free trade, at least you can get fair trade. Bill Brock, the U.S. Special Trade Representative, has repeated in various forums that neither the Congress nor the president will tolerate unfair trade policies. One way to prevent unfair treatment of U.S. exports and investments is to subscribe to the old maxim: an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth.

But reciprocity, if narrowly applied on a sector by sector basis, can be dangerous. First, trade is based on the idea of comparative advantage. Reciprocity doesn't take comparative advantage into account. The United States, for example, exports goods in which it has a comparative advantage, like agricultural goods, and imports goods in which it has only a relative comparative advantage, like Japanese cameras or computer components.

Second, the whole process of multilateral trade negotiations has been based on countries making concessions in some sectors to gain advantages in others. There is reciprocity on balance, not on a sector by sector basis.

Third, reciprocity could become a contagious disease for industries in trouble. Right now, steel, textiles and autos are considered exceptions to free trade rules because these industries need the time to adjust. But once reciprocity becomes the general rule, various industries will interpret it as a free-for-all.

Fourth, again if reciprocity were taken literally, the Commerce Department would have to set up a huge bureaucracy to administer the policy.

This isn't to say that the administration would go to such extremes or is even moving toward a policy of reciprocity. But before it considers retaliation in a case where it seems justified, it should consider the implications for trade in general.●

TRIBUTE TO WOODROW W. HART

HON. E de la GARZA

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 2, 1982

● Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, today I wish to pay tribute to Woodrow W. Hart, a distinguished Texan and an outstanding American.

Mr. Hart has made enormous contributions to the well-being of Texas agriculture. But his contributions have a far wider scope than that; they extend to his church, his community, his State, and indeed the Nation.

Woodrow Hart was born on November 12, 1916, to Thomas Carl Hart and Ludie Myers Hart of Sinton, San Patricio County, Tex. The Harts had come from Williamson County, Tex., in 1911 and settled in what is now known as Sodville, a community of rich black farmland near Sinton. Woodrow attended the Sinton schools while helping on the family farm. Upon graduation in 1934, he started to farm on his own. On December 23, 1939, he married Marilyn Baylor of Odem, Tex. They began farming in the Sodville area. They are the parents of two children.

In a quiet, easy but very effective manner, Woodrow Hart is a leader; a doer; an organizer. His primary professional concern has been agriculture. He was instrumental in founding the South Texas Cotton Grain Association, having served on the original board of directors in 1963. During his membership on the board, he served as its president from 1965 to 1969. He was later its chairman. Since 1973, he has been executive director of the association. He has served in numerous other capacities, including adviser to the National Cotton Council, past board member of Cotton Inc., past chairman of the Texas Association of Cotton Producers Organization (TACPO), and director of the Texas Pest Management Association (TPMA). Further, he has been active on the boards of various elevators and cotton gins, and as a director of the Port Compress, Corpus Christi, Tex. He has also been president and secretary of the Texas Farm Bureau.

There are other activities that have benefited from Mr. Hart's leadership. He was a director of the former local reclamation district in its early years, and devoted much time and effort to having the Texas Legislature create the San Patricio County Drainage District in 1971. The present drainage district held its first meeting on October 18, 1971, with Woodrow Hart as its chairman, a position he still holds.

The respect in which Woodrow Hart is held is illustrated by the honors bestowed upon him. He received the Lion's Club International Outstanding Soil Conservationist Award for San Patricio County in 1954, and the Progressive Farmer magazine Man of the Year in Texas Agriculture Award in 1974. He was named Texas County Agent recipient from district No. 14, Texas Man of the Year in Texas Agriculture in 1975.

In his community Mr. Hart has served since 1975 as an elder of the Sinton Church of Christ. He has been a member of the community board of equalization for several years, and the board of the housing authority since its beginning in 1968. And he has found time to be a loving husband and father.

Woodrow Hart is resigning as the executive director of South Texas Cotton Grain Association. He will, however, still be working on behalf of those worthy interests which have occupied his life. Known for his wisdom and experience, he has been asked to serve again and again.

The community, State, and country have been richly blessed with the talents and dedicated service of Woodrow W. Hart. This outstanding gentleman has been an example to all who have had an opportunity to know him. I am very pleased to have an opportunity to pay tribute to Mr. Hart and to extend best wishes to him and his family as he continues his devoted service to his fellow men.●

PARLIAMENTARY EMPHASIS MONTH

HON. VIC FAZIO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 2, 1982

● Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, on July 29 of last year, Senate Joint Resolution 102, which authorizes the President to declare April 1982 as "Parliamentary Emphasis Month," passed unanimously through the Senate. It is currently pending in the Census and Population Subcommittee of the House Post Office and Civil Service Committee. Because I and many of my colleagues of both parties recognize the critical role of parliamentary procedure in the daily conduct of the House and Senate, we have introduced an identical resolution in the House and hope to secure the 218 House cosponsors necessary to assure that this bill is reported for House consideration.

As the text of the bill states: "* * * the use of parliamentary procedure in the meetings of private and public organizations in this country promotes orderly deliberation and protects individual rights and majority rule, cardinal principles of governance in the United States * * *." Not only would enactment of this resolution pay special tribute to the legislative procedure of the Congress and State legislatures, but it would also lend encouragement and support to countless public and private groups and organizations throughout the country which use this democratic procedure in their regular transaction of business.

Furthermore, the one-time designation of April as "Parliamentary Emphasis Month" would pay respect to one of our Nation's Founding Fathers, Thomas Jefferson, who was born in that month. Among Jefferson's numerous and outstanding contributions to the early success of our democratic form of government was the preparation of the first comprehensive manual on parliamentary practice in this country which is still, to this day, published in each issue of the Rules and Practices of the House of Representatives.

The emphasis of Senate Joint Resolution 102 on parliamentary procedure has neither partisan nor political overtones. It is strongly supported by the National Association of Parliamentarians, the American Institute of Parliamentarians, and the Academy of Parliamentary Procedure and Law, three nonprofit organizations which have chapters across the country. I urge my colleagues to join in cosponsoring this legislation.●

CRASH OF FLIGHT 90

HON. FRANK R. WOLF

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 2, 1982

● Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, the following is an excellent article concerning the possible causes of the crash of Air Florida Flight 90 which appeared in the February 1, 1982, edition of the Washington Post. I wanted to share this article with the Members of the House.

CRASH OF FLIGHT 90 Looks More and More Like Classic Plane Accident, Experts Feel

(By Douglas B. Feaver and John Burgess)

The crash of Air Florida Flight 90 looks more and more like a classic aviation accident, one in which a number of long-recognized problems—any three or four of which the plane could have survived—combined for disaster.

It will be months before the National Transportation Safety Board reaches its final conclusion about what caused the Jan. 13 accident and the deaths of 78 people, but investigators and other experts feel strongly that all of these factors played a role:

The actions of the cockpit crew in wretched weather. It is probable that the pilot and copilot did not fully appreciate the danger of their situation until it was too late.

Snow and ice on the wings, which could have kept the plane from flying once it left the ground.

The Boeing 737's history of pitching up suddenly after takeoff if the front edge of its wings is covered, even slightly, with ice and snow.

Engine instrument sensors may have been frozen, which could have misled the crew into thinking their engines were working harder than they really were.

Snow and ice on the runway, which could have slowed the acceleration of the aircraft on takeoff.

The shortness of the runway at National Airport, which reduced both the time the crew members had to make decisions and the options available to them after they started their takeoff.

The absence of a requirement that pilots taking off monitor not only the speed of the plane, but the time and runway distance they have used in reaching that speed.

The absence of markers along the runways at civil airports telling pilots how much runway is left. The Air Force requires such markers.

In short, the accident investigation has turned into a series of "what-ifs?" What if the pilot had done this? What if federal regulations had required that? What if the airport had longer runways? What if airlines did not try to fly when it was snowing?

Regardless of where blame ultimately is placed, the weather was a dominant factor in the crash. Statistics developed by the safety board show that weather was a cause or a factor in 46.5 percent of all airline accidents between 1970 and 1979 and 46.2 percent of all fatal airline accidents. Aviation literature is full of warnings.

Donald W. Madole, a Washington lawyer who specializes in aircraft accident litigation, said in an interview, "I think that a takeoff on any runway-limited airport, in low visibility with slush and snow, is a test flight with passengers aboard." Madole is one of the lawyers representing Joseph F. Stiley III, a surviving passenger of Flight 90.

Very little is known so far about what Capt. Larry Wheaton and First Officer Roger Alan Pettit were saying to each other as they planned for the takeoff and in the short seconds of their flight, but it is on their shoulders that responsibility ultimately rests, assuming there was no unforeseeable mechanical failure. Federal regulations are clear: "Each pilot in command has full control and authority in the operation of the aircraft, without limitation . . ."

It is known that 43-minutes elapsed between the plane's last de-icing treatment and the takeoff and that between .7 and 1 inch of new snow fell in that period. The safety board has said since the accident that no more than 20 minutes should pass if it is snowing. The FAA regulations say, "No pilot may take off an airplane that has frost, snow or ice adhering to" engines, windshields, wings or control surfaces.

Ice and snow are dangerous because they can alter a wing's contours and reduce the wing's ability to lift the airplane. That can mean a plane will stall—lose the ability to remain in flight—at a higher speed than normal. But if the pilot believes he is going too fast to stall, he may take steps that only compound the problem.

Despite precautions, such as de-icing treatments and FAA warnings to all pilots, wing ice continues to figure in plane crashes. Two recent crashes led the safety board to recommend in November 1980 that the FAA formally remind airplane operators that ice still can form on wings after treatment with diluted de-icing fluids and that it distribute information on deicing fluids and their use. The FAA concurred with the first recommendation, but said the second was a job for fluid manufacturers.

A surviving passenger of Flight 90 recalled that ice on the plane was heavy enough to obscure the view out of windows, and that at least one window was still obscured when the plane left the terminal, though the ice fell away as the plan moved.

The captain of a Braniff plane that saw Flight 90 as it raced down the runway later has said he noticed ice on the fuselage and wings; his copilot recalls seeing it only on the fuselage. Other pilots reported noticing no ice on the plane.

The Air Florida crew ordered de-icing treatments twice before the flight. The first was interrupted when the main runway at National Airport was closed for plowing and sanding. The second, from a truck operated by American Airlines, began at about 3:15 p.m. A worker on the truck, using a hose and a nozzle, sprayed the plane's fuselage, wings and control surfaces. The treatment should have been 40 percent ethylene glycol and 60 percent water, according to investigators.

Wing ice never has been blamed for a 737 crash, but over the years pilots have reported that on takeoff in icy conditions the 737 can pitch up and roll without warning. Boeing has issued two bulletins warning airlines of this peculiarity and recommended cold-weather flight procedures to avoid it.

"The importance of maintaining clean, smooth wing leading edges must again be emphasized since a properly maintained wing would eliminate the need for any other actions," and article in Boeing's internal "Airliner" magazine warned late last year. Further, the article said, if there is frost on the wing leading edge, "the airplane must be accelerated an additional 10 knots on the ground."

In other words, if Flight 90's crew members did not add substantial speed to their takeoff calculations to compensate for possible ice or frost on their wings, they were at risk.

If the 737 was carrying enough ice to damage lift, it might still have got off the ground due to a phenomenon pilots call ground effect. A cushion of air builds beneath a plane as it gains speed on a runway. That cushion provides extra lift while the plane is close to the ground, but dissipates as the climbs. The highest altitude the Air Florida plane reached was 337 feet, investigators believe, before it crashed into the 14th Street bridge. Jets frequently climb 1,000 feet or more by the time they cross the bridge.

Investigators have said the 737 took an abnormally long time to accelerate to takeoff speed—47 seconds as opposed to the standard 30 seconds. That fits another crash theory in which the villain is ice, this time in the engine.

Because ice can damage the interior of high performance jet engines, the engines include devices that, when activated, divert a small amount of thrust to warm the inlet in the same way that a car heater channels motor warmth to the passenger compartment.

One part that is warmed is a sensor on the engine's nose. It measures the pressure of air going into the engine, and matched with the reading of another sensor in the back of the engine, produces and "engine pressure ratio" reading in the cockpit that shows how much thrust the engine is producing.

If the forward sensors on the Air Florida jet's two engines were frozen, the pilot could have seen artificially high readings on thrust, leading him to set the throttle too low. That is one possible explanation for the longer then normal takeoff roll.

However, there are three other instruments reporting conditions in the engines that would also be monitored by a prudent pilot, according to industry sources, and the readings on those three instruments should tell the crew either they had a bad gauge or to suspect engine performance, those sources say.

It is a preliminary conclusion of the safety board that the cockpit toggle switch that would give the engine anti-ice protection, and thus thaw the instrument sensors, was in the "off" position during takeoff. The Boeing 737 flight manual says that "Engine anti-icing should be turned on during all ground operations, takeoff and climb when icing conditions exist or are anticipated."

It is unclear, however, whether according to Air Florida procedures the engine deicing should have been on. According to the safety board, Air Florida's 737 manual requires its use in wet snow conditions but not with dry snow. The contents of the last weather report to the crew, including whether the snow was considered "wet" or "dry", is unclear. A written weather report Wheaton and Pettit had in the cockpit was destroyed in the crash.

Slow acceleration on takeoff could also be the result of heavy ice and snow buildup on the runway. Studies going back to 1960 show that water, slush and ice on the runway substantially slow jetliners on takeoff. An FAA advisory says that "takeoffs should not be attempted when standing water, slush or wet snow greater than ½ inch in depth covers an appreciable part of the runway."

Pilots have said that between ¼ and ½ inch of snow was on the runway at the time of Flight 90's takeoff.

Air traffic controllers cleared Flight 90 for takeoff at 3:59:24 p.m. It was the 16th plane to take off since the runway had been reopened after plowing. Other pilots reported no problems, but the board is studying their flight data recorders to check the performance of those aircraft against that of Flight 90.

Survivor Joseph Stiley told reporters that Flight 90 seemed to falter as it sped down the runway and it seemed as if the pilot was trying to abort the takeoff. Witnesses said Flight 90 finally lifted off near the intersection with Runway 33, about 1,300 feet farther than the 3,900 feet the plane should have needed for take-off.

Despite slow acceleration, the plane reached speeds that would be adequate for takeoff and flight—if everything were normal. However, the plane began to lose speed quickly as it climbed, pitched nose-up, some say as high as 30 degrees, then began falling.

If there were ice on the wings, frozen instrument sensors and a snow-packed runway, everything was not normal. Furthermore, the runway at National Airport, perfectly safe by the agreement of almost all aviators for good weather operations, becomes a little riskier when it is wet.

The pilot computes the takeoff speeds based on a chart that considers runway length, weight of the airplane, and other factors, including weather. The critical computations are called V1, the go, no-go speed, and accelerate-stop distance—roughly defined as the amount of runway it will take to safely stop the airplane if the takeoff is aborted at V1. Correction factors must be included for rain, snow and ice.

Once the plane starts rolling on takeoff, however, the only thing the pilot monitors is V1. If the runway is wet and icy, and he has not included enough allowance for how much that retards acceleration rates, and if his engine is not developing as much thrust as he thinks it is, he conceivably could run out of runway before reaching V1—and still be conforming.

If the runway was longer (the runways at Dulles, National's critics point out, are almost twice as long) the pilot would have more room to recover from a mistake.

The Air Force puts up big signs beside its runways that tell pilots how much room is left. The safety board and pilot groups have suggested to the FAA that it require similar signs at civil airports. The FAA proposed a rule requiring such signs in 1975, then withdrew it in 1977.

"In general," The FAA noted in its withdrawal notice, "opposition centers around the high cost of installation and maintenance of the markers when compared to what many believe are limited benefits to be derived from their installation."

Further, the FAA said, "the use of runway markers during takeoff might result in a potentially unsafe situation since the pilot not in control would be required to monitor passage of the markers. This would divert his attention from adequately monitoring engine and flight instruments . . . during a most critical period of the takeoff."

The withdrawal notice was signed by R. P. Scully, then associate administrator for fight standards, and now senior vice president for operations at Air Florida.●

HON. JAMES C. DAVIS, FORMER CONGRESSMAN FROM GEORGIA

HON. CLEMENT J. ZABLOCKI

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 2, 1982

● Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, I was saddened to learn of the recent death of former Congressman James C. Davis, of Georgia, with whom I served during all but 2 years of his tenure in this body.

Throughout his career, as a Marine Corps veteran of World War I, a lawyer, judge, legislator, and publisher, Mr. Davis reflected many of the most admirable characteristics of the old school in American politics, such as courtesy, personal integrity, reliability, and unwavering adherence to those programs and policies in which he believed.

One of his nephews has described him as a determined character with a dry sense of humor and that is my recollection, as well. While my own views, particularly in the civil rights field, differed substantially with his, I never doubted his sincerity or the depth of his convictions. He was clearly a man whose archly, conservative views evoked much controversy and eventually, political opposition, but also a high degree of universal respect.

To his family and friends, I want to take this opportunity to extend my deepest sympathy.●

WORCESTER, MASS., SELECTS A WOMAN MAYOR FOR THE FIRST TIME IN MUNICIPAL HISTORY

HON. JOSEPH D. EARLY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 2, 1982

● Mr. EARLY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to include in the RECORD a copy, with other material, of the formal request made to me by the city council of my home community of Worcester, Mass., through the city clerk, Hon. Robert J. O'Keefe, in connection with the mayorality election held by the city council on December 15, 1981.

Worcester presently has a plan E. City manager form of local government under which nine councilors are elected at large and they then choose one of their number to serve as mayor to preside over city council and school committee meetings, greet distinguished visitors and otherwise represent the city on and at various ceremonial events and occassions.

Sara J. Robertson, the first woman in our municipal history to be selected as mayor is a leading citizen in our area, has long participated in and contributed to the promotion of community objectives and has the most valuable asset of several years combined experience as a member of both the city council and school committee. I extend my personal congratulations to Mrs. Robertson on this special distinction and join with my fellow citizens of Worcester in wishing her a most successful term as mayor of "the Heart of the Commonwealth." The city council petition and a pertinent editorial from the Worcester Telegram issue of December 17, 1981, follow:

CITY OF WORCESTER

Pursuant to the vote of the City Council, be it,

Requested, That Congressman Joseph Early place into the Congressional Record the notice of the historical election of Sara J. Robertson as the first woman mayor for the city of Worcester.

[From the Worcester Telegram, Dec. 17, 1981]

YES, MRS. ROBERTSON

There's probably no way to ignore the fact that Worcester's next mayor will be a woman. Nor should it be ignored; after all, it's the first time and it has a certain significance. Another barrier has fallen.

However, Sara Robertson did not win the preliminary vote because she is a woman, but because she was a logical compromise candidate to end a seemingly hopeless deadlock. And it will not be her sex but her ability that will count in the next two years.

Although the position of mayor is largely ceremonial under Plan E, the chairmanship of the School Committee is not. As a former elected member of the School Committee, and as an elected member of the City Council, Mrs. Robertson has a good perspective of what can and should be done in allocating the dwindling financial resources of the city.

As a member of the School Committee and the City Council, Mrs. Robertson has been a hard worker. She has asked the right questions. She objected, in one of her campaigns, to being termed "aggressive." But, if that means she holds to her principles and speaks her mind freely, it is a compliment.

We are sure of one thing: As mayor and chairman of the School Committee, Mrs. Robertson will give the last ounce of her considerable energies to serve the people of Worcester and be a credit to this community.

She has our warm congratulations.●

INFRASTRUCTURE NEEDS REQUIRE PROPER ATTENTION

HON. DON H. CLAUSEN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 2, 1982

● Mr. CLAUSEN. Mr. Speaker, the following column by our colleague, WILLIAM F. CLINGER, JR., of Pennsylvania, illustrates a very important point worth considering as we approach this year's budgetary process. As Mr. CLINGER's article makes clear, unless proper attention is paid to our public infrastructure needs, it will be very difficult to convince businesses to undertake the private capital expansion necessary for job creation and sustained economic growth. I urge all Members to take a serious look at Mr. CLINGER's ideas, which appeared on the op-ed page of today's New York Times. His thoughts provide a logical argument for moving away from the traditional approach to capital-expenditures budgeting:

[From the New York Times, February 2, 1982]

CAPITAL-BUDGETING

(By William F. Clinger, Jr.)

WASHINGTON—The Government must turn its attention to the national infrastructure—highways, sewers, ports, bridges, water systems—if the economy is to expand.

So far, the providing of supply-side incentives to the private sector to promote national economic renewal has excluded attention to infrastructure problems, but that is a risky course. Indeed, "America in Ruins," a 1981 report by the National Governors Association, states that up to two-thirds of our towns and cities cannot accommodate new economic growth because local infrastructures are either worn out or undersized. The cost of reversing this decline is staggering. But the consequences of not doing so are even worse to contemplate.

The Federal Highway Administration estimates the cost of repairing or replacing America's deficient bridges at $41 billion. Aside from $7 billion worth of deferred maintenance that is needed, the outlay required to preserve the Interstate Highway System, which represents only 1 percent of the nation's roads, is estimated at $1.4 billion annually through 1991.

Unfortunately, these statistics, though somewhat known in Washington, nonetheless usually do not focus attention on infrastructure problems because of the more immediate demands placed on the Federal budget to meet the growing costs of current programs, especially entitlements. This is particularly true in a period of fiscal restraint. It may take a catastrophe to focus our attention on infrastructure problems.

Congressional efforts to evaluate spending priorities tend to ignore infrastructure needs, principally because the Federal budget does not distinguish between operating costs and capital expenditures. Past efforts to distinguish between these two categories have failed, largely because of criticism that doing so would result in large expenditures on public-works projects at the expense of more-immediate human needs.

In a new approach to capital-expenditures budgeting, the Government could neutralize this concern by mandating that national infrastructure needs be presented in the budget apart from operating expenses, while at the same time not requiring additional spending for them. Under this approach, infrastructure needs would be catalogued in the budget. This would enable Congress to set spending priorities with a clearer understanding of long-term ramifications, especially the consequences of failing to address crucial problems.

As part of its budget deliberations, Congress could attempt a conscious balancing of the Government's operating costs and national infrastructure needs. At present, projects are approved piecemeal, and this practice encourages the pork-barrel approach to decision-making.

The logical first step away from pork-barreling toward a more objective approach is to shift decisions about meeting infrastructure needs away from what has been a purely legislative process. Only the executive branch can provide a fully detailed analysis of infrastructure requirements nationwide so that an inventory of these needs can be juxtaposed against other budgetary requirements. At the same time, an assessment can be made of Federal, state, and local responsibility for various infrastructures.

At present, no single Federal agency is responsible for defining or monitoring capital investments. As a result, assets that are capital investments to some agencies may be considered current expenses to others—for example, Agency A may view new office furniture as a capital outlay, and Agency B may view it as a standard annual expense—despite the practice since 1951 of summarizing the investment, operating, and other outlays of the Government each fiscal year.

While the idea of writing a budget that incorporates capital expenditures has received a somewhat less than enthusiastic response in the past, largely because of the complexities involved, there is no reason why a more limited approach dealing specifically with infrastructure needs could not be used effectively.

It is unfortunate that a large and growing number of communities find their economic revitalization efforts hamstrung because of the condition of their basic public facilities. This is a situation that cannot be overlooked by an economic plan dedicated to a "full investment" philosophy. It is difficult to foresee capital investment increasing rapidly unless the business community is convinced that a prosperous future is possible.●

CONGRESSIONAL CALL TO CONSCIENCE, VIGIL, 1982

HON. NORMAN F. LENT

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 2, 1982

● Mr. LENT. Mr. Speaker, as this second session of the 97th Congress gets underway, it is imperative that we in the Congress intensify our efforts to combat the appalling rise in anti-Semitism within the Soviet Union.

Increasingly, those who seek the freedom to practice the religion of their choice in the country of their choice have incurred the vengeful wrath of the heartless regime ruling the Soviet Union.

For example the most recent report of the Union of Councils for Soviet Jews informs us that emigration of those Soviet Jews who are, grudgingly, permitted to leave Russia dropped below 10,000 in 1981, the lowest level since the inception of the Soviet Jewry movement more than a decade ago.

Still worse, anti-Semitism in the government-controlled media and professions within the Soviet Union has increased dramatically. Tragically, so have arrests of key activists. And heightened persecution and harassment have been brought to bear on all who have the courage to speak out for their rights.

With this ominous background, Mr. Speaker, I ask every one of my colleagues to join in a united congressional effort to assist the courageous men and women suffering from increased oppression in the Soviet Union. Join in our Congressional Call to Conscience, Vigil, 1982.

Mr. Speaker, it is my honor to be chairman of the Congressional Call to Conscience for this session. The effectiveness of our Vigil, 1982 depends upon the number of Members who join in speaking out in behalf of the thousands of Soviet citizens undergoing the cruelest sort of persecution for their religious beliefs.

I cannot overemphasize the importance of your participation. Your words do make a difference. I can testify to that from personal experience.

Last summer, I spent a most moving hour talking with my former prisoner of conscience, Hillel Butman. For more than 5 years I had campaigned for his release from a Soviet prison with letters, telegrams and personal appeals to both American and Soviet officials. Finally, the Soviets freed Hillel and permitted him to emigrate to Israel to be reunited with his wife and daughters. In our long conversation, Hillel kept emphasizing one point over and over again: Make certain that Members of Congress continue to speak out, as I had done, on behalf of the Soviet Jews still being persecuted and imprisoned in the Soviet Union. Hillel declared that this support from American legislators is of great importance and great assistance.

The same message came from my new prisoner of conscience, the "Guardian Angel of Moscow", Ida Nudel. Exiled to the bleak and desolate wastelands of Siberia for displaying a banner from her Moscow apartment demanding a visa, Ida still is fighting for her freedom. She managed to send me a postcard from the little village where she is serving her sentence. She told me to keep up the fight: "I ask you very much, in spite of things not going as we dream, don't give up. Be stubborn and you will succeed!"

Mr. Speaker, those words from a remote Siberian village should be the guidelines for all of us in this second session of the 97th Congress. We must not give up, even though things may not be going as we like. We must be stubborn and persistent, and do all that we can to speak out against the terrible suppression of human rights in the Soviet Union.

Mr. Speaker, I invite every one of my colleagues to share in our Congressional Call to Conscience, Vigil, 1982. Let 435 voices join in a powerful message to the heartless rulers of the Kremlin: This must not go on! The more of us who speak out, the more help we can give to those suffering in the Soviet Union.●

NEW GOVERNMENT IN FRANCE CONTINUES SUPPORT OF NUCLEAR POWER

HON. MARILYN LLOYD BOUQUARD

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 2, 1982

● Mrs. BOUQUARD. Mr. Speaker, since the election of President Mitterand and the emergency of a new political majority in France, a reevaluation of that country's energy policy has taken place. This reevaluation culminated in a vote this past October on a national energy policy aimed at reducing the French energy consumption dependency on foreign supplies from the current 70 percent to 50 percent by the year 1990.

The newly adopted energy policy approves a nuclear program almost as vigorous as the program supported under former President Gisgard d'Estaing.

At an atomic industrial forum conference held this past November, Messrs. Pecqueur and Rapin of France presented a paper outlining the major goals of the new energy policy and in particular the role nuclear energy will play in providing additional margins of power supply.

It is envisioned that nuclear energy will provide 27 percent of France's primary energy needs in the year 1990 compared to 6.7 percent provided in 1980.

France's near-term energy plan indicates a 1990 installed capacity of 56 GWe to be provided by nuclear powerplants. This includes 30 units presently in operation; 26 units under construction; and 6 units to be ordered between 1982 and 1983. Plans for plant orders after 1984 will be revealed in a 5-year plan currently in preparation.

One advantage of nuclear power in France is economic. According to recent forecasts by Electricite de France (EDF), the price of nuclear power in 1990 will be only 48 percent the price of coal power and 28 percent the price of oil-fired electricity.

It is anticipated that among the results of the French energy plan for the nuclear industry will be increased competitiveness for exports. In addition, the potential exists for increased cooperation with the United States and other countries for work toward standardizing nuclear power units and perhaps eventually pooling resources in multinational ventures to build fuel cycle plants.

Mr. Speaker, a major aspect of the French energy plan that should be noted is the goal of obtaining better public acceptance by developing a "new citizenship" through greater dissemination of information to the public and the elected representatives, as well as sharing the decisionmaking responsibilities between local authorities, regional authorities, and the national government. This approach has resulted in favorable votes for restart of on-site work at nuclear plants which had been "frozen" until the new government's energy plan was finalized. This approach is in stark contrast to the approach of the Carter administration which we recently documented in ERP Subcommittee hearings on "Nuclear Public Information and Rational Public Policy Decisions."

Mr. Speaker, I am bringing these points to the attention of my colleagues to illustrate that a vigorous nuclear energy program can contribute significantly toward a nation's energy independence regardless of political changes.

In order to further understand how this rationale developed in France and to highlight several implications for potential cooperation with the United States I am including the text of the paper presented by Messers. Pecqueur and Rapin.

A.I.F.—THE FRENCH NUCLEAR PROGRAMME: PERMANENT NEEDS AND POLITICAL CHANGES

(By M. Pecqueur and M. Rapin)

INTRODUCTION

During the twelve months which have elapsed since the last ANS/AIF Winter meeting, two major political events have occured, which had direct consequencs on U.S. and French nuclear policies:

Change of administration in U.S., following President Reagan's election;

New political majority in France, issued from presidential and legislative elections.

In both countries, President Reagan and President Mitterand expressed, as candidates, their intention to reexamine thoroughly the previous energetic and nuclear policies followed in their respective countries, and to modify them wherever they judge it appropriate.

In France, the reevaluation of the energy policy and of the nuclear programme started right after the parliamentary elections both at the governmental and parliamentary levels, and lasted until the national debate which took place at the parliament on last October 6 and 7. This debate was concluded by a vote approving clearly (331/67) the energy policy, and in particular the nuclear programme, which had been proposed by the government for the forecoming years. I would like to summarize briefly which are the characteristics of this energy policy, taking into account the French energy needs and the political context, and their consequences for the French nuclear programme.

FRENCH GOVERNMENT'S MAJOR GOALS

Economically speaking, the French government has fixed two major goals:

To increase the economic growth rate up to 3% in 1982 and to 5% in the following years;

To reduce the economic growth dependency upon the energy consumption.

These targets have led to propose an energetic programme which has been summarized by the Prime Minister, Mr. Mauroy, in three major items, when he opened the parliamentary debate:

to reduce France's energy dependency through an increasing energy resource diversification, where the priority is given to national resources. This implies notably a nuclear equipment which must be sufficient to avoid any energy shortage; to develop a new approach to the energy problem by privileging energy consumption mastery rather than expanding production; to develop a "new citizenship" involving a better information of each citizen on energy problems, and a real sharing of responsibilities between local authorities, regional authorities and national government.

REDUCTION OF FRANCE'S ENERGY DEPENDENCY BY A NEW APPROACH

Presently, the French primary energy consumption depends for 70% upon foreign supplies—notably 56% for coal, 98% for oil, 70% for gas—and it is aimed at decreasing this dependency down to 50% in 1990. To reach such a goal, the following efforts have been decided:

A quite large effort will be made to master both domestic and industrial energy consumptions. In spite of the economic growth rates which are aimed at in the forecoming years (3-5%), the primary energy consumption forecast for 1990 is only 232 MTOE, lower by 5% than the previous prediction (242 MTep), whereas the 1980 consumption was 192 MTOE. Energy savings issued from a more rational use of energy will be founded upon increased R and D work and will be achieved with new financial, institutional and regulatory means.

For what concerns the national energy resources, it is forecast to increase the coal national production with accepting to pay for it a limited overcost with respect to the mean value of imported coal: this overcost covers in some way insurance for independent coal supplies. As to renewable energies, it is aimed at multiplying by three their contribution to the energy balance between now—in 1981 they will amount to 3,4 MTOE—and 1990.

It must be underlined that optimization of rational energy use, development of coal production and consumption, and development of renewable energy resources correspond to two specific orientations choosen by the government:

they imply a largely increased effort in R and D: fundings will be multiplied by a factor three between 1981 and 1985; they fit particularly well to a decentralized energy policy since they can be initiated and mostly achieved at the regional level.

The nuclear programme—described in more detail hereafter—will be continued on a high level in order to prevent the economy from any energy shortage by providing sufficient margins. Moreover this will keep to the French nuclear industry its efficiency and its competitiveness for exports. Finally, the following table provides a comparison between the 1980 energy situation, and the one which is expected for 1990:

	1980		1990
	MTOE	Percent	MTOE	Percent (approximate values)
Primary energy needs	191.8	100	232	100
Coal	34.0	17.7	35–40	16
Oil	102.1	53.2	70–75	31
Gas	23.6	12.3	31–40	15
Hydroelectricity	16.0	8.4	14–16	6
Soft energies	3.2	1.7	10–14	5
Nuclear	12.9	6.7	60–66	27

One observes that globally speaking, the structure of primary energy consumption which is expected for 1990 is not far from the one forecast by the previous government: oil 30%, fossile resources 30%, nuclear 30%, renewable energies 10%.

FRENCH NUCLEAR PROGRAMME

Forecast installed capacity

It must be pointed out that during and after the legislative elections, two main nuclear policies were envisaged:

The large programme carried out by the previous governments and aiming at a 59 GWe installed capacity in 1990;

A significantly reduced programme, typically 39 GWe installed by 1990, proposed by a fraction of the Socialist Party.

Finally, the government decided, and the Parliament approved, a programme rather close to the previous one, in order to insure energy supply whatever could be the uncertainties on the other energy resources.

6 PWR units will be ordered by 1982 and 1983: 5x1300 MWe and 1x900 MWe instead of 9 units previously forecast for those two years: 6x1300 MWe and 3x900 MWe. This will lead to a 56 GWe installed capacity by 1990:

30 units presently in operation: 21.8 GWe (net)

26 units in construction: 28.6 GWe (net)

6 units to be ordered 1982-1983: 7.2 GWe (net)

6 units to be disconnected from the grid between 1982 and 1990: 1.6 GWe

Orders for next plants from 1984 onwards will be decided partly according to the 1984-1988 five year plan currently under preparation.

It is worthwhile to recall that all the PWR units are built by Framatome which signed in last April 1981 a new cooperation agreement with Westinghouse on the basis of equal partnership instead of the previous licensor to licensee relationship.

The first 1300 MWe station to be connected to the grid is being built at Paluel in West of France and will be in operation by 1984.

Fast breeder programme

The national energetic debate did not address the question of fast breeders, because no major decision has to be taken in the near future: according to the approach previously used to order Phenix and Superphenix, the decision for building future breeders will be taken after a one year period of Superphenix operation. Nevertheless two facts have to be mentioned:

Work on Superphenix site is going steadily, like for all power plants for which construction had started before the elections;

Design studies of Superphenix 2 units are continuing at a level of funding equivalent to those of previous years.

LWR fuel reprocessing

As stated by the Prime Minister during the national debate: nobody can assess that there is a better solution than reprocessing for irradiated fuels. Following the Parliament approval, La Hague reprocessing plant will be modernized and extended in order:

To guarantee an improved safety for workers;

To respect the reprocessing contracts signed with foreign partners.

A special scientific commission will examine all the problems related to irradiated fuel management and the work on site for UP3—specifically devoted to foreign contracts—will not start before 6 months.

FBR fuel cycle

As well known, fast breeders require a closed fuel cycle: this has been clearly achieved for Phenix where presently 73 subassemblies inserted in the core have been fabricated with plutonium issued from Phenix reprocessed subassemblies. Fuel fabrication and fuel reprocessing have been quite satisfactorily demonstrated at the workshop level:

At Cadarache for fuel fabrication where Rapsodie, Phenix and Superphenix fuels are fabricated,

At La Hague and Marcoule for fuel reprocessing (a total amount of 12 t-U + Pu- has been reprocessing until now).

As far as future plants are concerned for commercial size breeders, studies are going on by CEA and COGEMA in order to optimize plant capacity and time schedule for operation in order to minimize the FBR fuel cycle costs. Indeed one has to note that an intermediate capacity for a fabrication on reprocessing plant, i.e. corresponding only to 1 or 2 commercial breeders, must be ruled out from the economical point of view because of leading to unacceptable fuel cycle cost.

NEW PROCEDURES

If the nuclear programme defined by the government remains rather close to the previous one, the procedures which will be followed for its development have been significantly modified. These procedures reflect the will of increasing the citizens participation to the choices by:

Giving a better information both to citizens and to representatives in charge of decision-making;

Decentralizing the decisions;

Consulting the local and regional population through their representatives;

Controlling the nuclear development by parliamentary and administrative authorities.

This will be achieved by setting new consultative organisms at local, regional and national levels, and by increasing the role of safety organisms.

A typical example of the approach is given by the consultations recently made to restart the work on the sites which were frozen after the elections until the national debate.

Indeed, according to what was decided by the government, consultations are in progress to determine the opportunity of restarting the work on five frozen sites:

At the local level, in the parishes surrounding each frozen site,

At the regional level, if the local representatives are unfavourable to work restart,

Eventually in the parliament, if an opposition appears between regional and national positions.

As an example the following table presents the results of the local consultations for these five frozen sites and the partial results available up to now at the regional level:

Sites	Number of parishes concerned	Their votes (Yes/No/Abstentions)	Vote of the region
Chooz (4x1300 MWe)	14	8/4/2
Cattenom (4x1300 MWe)	13	8/3/2
Civaux (4x1300 MWe)	9	7/0/2
Golfech (4x1300 MWe)	16	7/8/1	Yes (39/14); 21 abstentions.
Le Pellerin (4x1300 MWe)	12	5/7/0	Yes (62–16); 2 abstentions.

Incidentally, one can note that the proportion of parishes favourable to restart of the on-site work reflects rather well the proportion of citizens in favour of nuclear energy as expressed by a recent call-up: 62%.

CONCLUSION

French recent political events leading to a new majority have put in evidence that:

Due to France's energy situation, the national nuclear programme is practically independent of political changes;

A better public acceptance can be aimed at through larger information of citizens and elected representatives, and through sharing of decision making at various levels.

Finally, the nuclear energy relative contribution to the total energy consumption does not change significantly and the main change concerns the primary energy needs which should be reduced by a more rational use of energy.

In the same time, President Reagan's recent address on nuclear energy confirms the new administration will for restarting US nuclear programme. The convergence between U.S. and French views on the necessity of nuclear energy should help to revitalize nuclear programmes worldwide.

Convergences of view points on the necessity of developing nuclear energy should lead to an increased international cooperation which permit to spare national fundings to design standardized units, and eventually to pool fuel cycle plants between several countries.●

● Mr. McDONALD. Mr. Speaker, If anyone still has any doubts as to our growing strategic vulnerability, they should read carefully the short study prepared by Mr. Igore Glagol'ev, a Soviet defector. It is a grim picture indeed. Soviet production lines continue to roll and it appears that no new American strategic weapons can be ready until 1985, if then. NO, IT'S MORALLY WRONG

HON. NORMAN D. SHUMWAY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 2, 1982

● Mr. SHUMWAY. Mr. Speaker, the newspapers have recently carried several articles dealing with new regulations being developed by the Department of Health and Human Services to regulate the family planning programs conducted by the Federal Government. Most of these are carried out under title X of the Public Health Services Act.

It has long been my view that actions of the Federal Government in this area are extremely important, though not necessarily beneficial. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, it has been my observation that the current "epidemic" in teenage pregnancies correlates perfectly with the commencement and increase in the Federal funding of "family planning" programs.

That is so, I believe, because most of the agencies which have received Federal money to carry out family planning activities do so without any attention at all to the moral implications of sexual relations. Indeed, the majority of these agencies have gone out of their way to insist that they will make no judgments whatever about the morality of sexual relations for teenagers—or for that matter for adults, in whatever variety they may occur. Sex for teenagers, these agencies insist, is their own business. Our only job is to see that they do not get hurt, so we provide them with contraceptives, and abortions if they want them. What they want and do is their business, and none of ours.

The result, of course, is easy justification to adolescents to follow the demands of their physical natures. Thus the mushrooming rates of venereal disease, teenage pregnancy, illegitimate births, and abortion.

Mr. Speaker, the Washington Post columnist Colman McCarthy has recently written about the fatuousness of this approach. Mr. McCarthy, certainly not a Moral Majoritarian—though quite possibly a member of the Moral Majority—sees clearly that we have no hesitation in telling young people that it is wrong to shoplift, take drugs, or cheat in school, and asks why it is so hard for us to tell them that it is wrong to have sex at their age.

Mr. Speaker, I found Mr. McCarthy's comments very much to the point, as we think about the regulations soon to emerge from HHS, and I ask unanimous consent that they be printed at this point in the RECORD:

NO, IT'S MORALLY WRONG

As teachers of reproduction, the Planned Parenthood Federation of America has few peers. As counselors in sexuality, it has few ideas.

Nowhere is the difference better seen than in "Teensex? It's Okay to Say NO WAY." Last week the federation announced that the pamphlet has become a "best-seller," with 1.5 million copies distributed since publication in 1979.

No one can quarrel with the pamphlet's effort to "allay the hesitation and fear some teen-agers feel about saying 'no' " to sex. And no one can deny that the high rates of teen-age pregnancy, abortion and veneral disease have created a chaos in which it appears, as one social observer noted, "Our biological drives are several million years older than our intelligence."

The intellectual failure of Planned Parenthood is that it provides no moral context for the discussion. The ethical teachings of history's moral leaders on promiscuity are ignored. Instead, teen-agers are spoken to in pitter-pat. The federation counsels them not to be taken in by the line "C'mon, everybody's doing it." They are told the "only question is: What's right for you?" They are advised that sex won't cure loneliness, prove independence or increase popularity.

But they aren't given moral guidance—that sexual looseness violates moral codes representing the collective integrity that has endured throughout history. They aren't told that chastity and abstinence for adolescents are values honored in all the world's major religions.

That groups like Planned Parenthood avoid the moral context of human sexuality is an easy out: the kids might call us prudes, they might tell us to peddle our Victorian hangups elsewhere.

Such hesitation vanishes when we tell the young that it is morally wrong to shoplift, to take drugs or to cheat in school.

Schools and public service agencies that don't hesitate to impart these value-laden strictures lose their nerve in sexual education. Some schools see themselves as forward-thinking merely to be giving courses in sexual technology. Others go further and join the Planned Parenthood effort to provide value-free counseling.

But it's not enough. It leaves the young floating free. One way or another, they are being sexually educated all the time—at the magazine back, by films and television, by advertisements that depict Joe Namath or Brooke Shields hawking suggestiveness.

With human sexuality being "taught" in this kind of cultural explosion, the chances increase that the young will make sexual decisions based on ignorance. If a group like Planned Parenthood, which puts itself forward as an "advocate of reproductive rights for everyone," is tepid about discussing moral codes, the young are that much more vulnerable to reactionary moralizers at the other extreme. These are the book-banners and finger-pointers who in their Thou-Shalt-Not crusades offer nothing more than railing against America the New Sodom and Gomorah.

Caught in the middle and supported by neither the pamphleteers of Planned Parenthood nor the New Puritans passing their "family life" laws, are educators like Mary Lee Tatum. For the past nine years, she has been teaching a seminar in human sexuality within a value framework at George Mason High School in Falls Church. "The students really want to talk about morals and values," she says. "They are eager to discuss why they do things and the consequences of their behavior, romantic and sexual. In the classroom, I try to create an excitement about developing one's values.

Every high school in the country should have a teacher like Mary Lee Tatum. She understands that a moral perspective is as needed a form of prevention against unwanted pregnancy and venereal disease as a knowledge of birth control, fertility and anatomy.

For the unmarried young, it's okay to say, "no, it's morally wrong."●

WORKER SAFETY IMPROVEMENTS SET OSHA BENCHMARK

HON. JOSEPH M. GAYDOS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 2, 1982

● Mr. GAYDOS. Mr. Speaker, figures on job-related fatalities, injuries, and illnesses in the United States in 1980 became available late last year, and all fell simultaneously for the first time in 5 years.

In this development we are doubly fortunate.

The first good fortune touches on human and economic values—hundreds of thousands of workers were spared—and the second on evidence and political judgment.

As the current controversy over the economy shows, events rarely develop in ways that furnish a clear benchmark against which to judge changes in governing attitudes.

But these 1980 figures from the Bureau of Labor Statistics (BLS) mean just such a reference exists for the Occupational Safety and Health Administration (OSHA).

As 1981 began, a new administration and a new attitude took hold at OSHA, and the deregulators and the new managers began to throw out the old ways of doing things just as fast as the rules of procedure would let it happen.

But in the figures for 1980, we have a clear picture of the result of doing things the old way, and this decline in fatalities, injuries and illnesses is the line between old and new; it is clear and unmistakable.

For the record, Mr. Speaker, the BLS figures indicate that the much-criticized old ways of attaining occupational safety and health brought about the following results:

A fall in occupational injury and illness from 9.5 cases per 100 full-time workers in 1979 to 8.7 in 1980; a fall in fatalities from 8.6 per 100,000 workers to 7.7; a fall in the lost workday incidence rate from 4.2 to 3.9; and a fall in injury rates in all size categories for industry.

The BLS said this meant: 500,000 fewer job-related injuries (or an adjusted 400,000 fewer if you accept the finding that 20 percent of the decline was due to fewer hours worked in 1980); 200,000 fewer injuries involving lost workdays; 1,700,000 fewer lost workdays; and a decline by 18,700 in new occupational diseases diagnosed.

Congress put OSHA in business in 1971, and since then, the injury rate and lost workdays have been points upon which critics have fastened their jaws.

To those who contended the injury rate made the drive for occupational safety and health a failure, I say, I disagree because the task was tremendous in scope, and the rates fell, in fact, as a result of the effort.

These BLS figures cover just about everything anybody does to make a living in the United States, and all credit for the general reduction cannot go to OSHA because other agencies and jurisdictions are involved.

But the main share of the responsibility—and all of the criticism—was assigned to OSHA, and so should be much of the credit.

The policies, practices, standards, and enforcement that brought about this decline now are undergoing administrative reevaluation and modification.

As chairman of the Subcommittee on Health and Safety, I welcome the clear demarcation between the old and the new, as should all who are interested in worker health and safety.

Congress should keep in mind this success that OSHA has had, as should those tempted to replace the now-proved with the untested.

SISTER CITIES OF SACRAMENTO AND MATSUYAMA PROMOTE UNDERSTANDING

HON. ROBERT T. MATSUI

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 2, 1982

● Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to bring to the attention of my colleagues an outstanding example of international goodwill that has developed between the capital city of the State of California and the capital city of the Ehime Prefecture of Japan.

The cities of Sacramento and Matsuyama last year entered into a formal agreement to share "sister city" status, an affiliation which gives citizens of each community a unique opportunity to broaden their understanding of the cultures of our two great nations.

These sister cities have much in common. Both are superbly positioned between the sea and the mountains, sharing qualities of tremendous natural beauty. The official flower of each is the beautiful camellia; both communities proudly hold annual camellia festivals.

Though Sacremento and Matsuyama are separated by 6,000 miles, a close bond of friendship is developing, both at the official levels of city government and among individual citizens.

A number of exchange visits have already occurred, including a visit to Sacramento last August by Matsuyama Mayor Tokio Nakamura and 26 other citizens of his community. Mayor Nakamura joined Sacramento Mayor Phillip Isenberg in signing the document officially declaring the sister city arrangement.

I would like to take this opportunity to formally commend an outstanding member of the Sacramento communty, Dr. Virginia S. Mueller, for her leadership in helping to establish and continuing to promote this excellent civic enterprise. Dr. Mueller serves as president of the Sacramento-Matsuyama Sister City Corp. and has represented Sacramento in travel to Matsuyama.

I would like to urge my colleagues to consider promoting sister city arrangements between their own communities and cities throughout the world. Establishing these bonds of friendship can contribute immeasurably to international understanding.●

AN AWARD WINNING SPEECH

HON. ROY DYSON

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 2, 1982

● Mr. DYSON. Mr. Speaker, an article by Kathleen Jarboe, in the Afternoon Delight of St. Mary's County, Md., provides an interesting perspective on America today. The freedom of expression which we hold dear in this country can not be taken for granted. I insert this article, as a sign that all the people of the United States have a responsibility to let their voices be heard and help shape the course of this great Nation.

The article follows:

VOICE OF DEMOCRACY

Together we build America—this is an obvious statement. We know whatever America becomes, it will be the sum total of her people. So together we build America. What will we build? What is the ideal America?

If I took a dozen people, and asked them each to build a common place object, in the end I would have twelve different and unique objects. All would be correct, but all would be different because they were created by different people, with different views of the end goal.

What then, is our goal? Is it peace? Is it a better education for our children? Is it a better economy? Is it freedom? Is it all of these things? And if so, how do we see achieving them? How can we know? Without communication we cannot.

That is why the freedom of expression is so stressed in our nation; because it is not just a freedom to take or leave, but a duty. It is our duty, to examine what we believe and communicate that to others, in order to make a better defined picture of our goal.

Our views for America are comparable to a vector, which represents a force with its own direction and magnitude. If I took a graph with thousands of vectors on it, only one vector would represent the sum total. If just one vector were added, the major vector would change. Just as every vector has an effect or the ultimate direction and magnitude of the major vector, so all expressed views and concepts have an influence on the direction of society. It is impossible, then, to know our true goal for our nation, without everyone willing to express themselves and be heard. Americans mustn't fear the freedom of expression. In a democracy, no one can afford to fear speaking out or having others be open with their opinions. We must have faith that the final vector and final direction of society will be one of a positive force. We must have faith in one another and we must be worthy of the faith of others.

As within an independent organism, the cells are interdependent, so within our independent nation we depend upon one another. And just as within that organism each cell must continually send out impulses, so must each of us, as citizens, continually express and communicate our ideas, views and opinions of our goal. There are millions of cells within a body and millions of people within our nation. Yet, it takes only one cell to stop functioning properly, to stop giving impulses, to cause a cancer to develop. It takes just one person to stop communicating, to cause a mutation in our society leading to a cancer of indifference. This is what we must fight and the most effective way is to prevent it within our individual selves. If we each do our part, use and express our own unique way of seeing things, our goal will be clear. Then we can unite behind that goal, building together the America within us all.●

ECONOMIC RECOVERY AND THE SPACE PROGRAM

HON. DON FUQUA

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 2, 1982

● Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday, January 23, 1982, the Washington Post printed an editorial entitled "The Savaging of the Space Program." I was particularly interested in the editorial for two reasons: First, because of my longtime interest in space, and second, because I had recently received an informative letter from the author of the editorial, Prof. Michael E. Lipschutz of the Purdue Chemistry Department

The administration has announced its intention to cut back NASA's planetary program through which Voyagers I and II have brought us the marvelous pictures of Saturn and Jupiter, and Professor Lipschutz clearly describes the impacts this will have on his and similar research efforts. The cuts are presented as part of a program for economic recovery, but I have serious reservations that cutting such programs will help such a recovery.

A major tenet of the theory behind the administration's plan seems to be that an increase in confidence in the future will lead to greater investment and subsequent industrial activity. But the cutting of programs such as NASA's planetary exploration activities is not consonant with the theory. Such cuts turn away from the future; they represent a denial of investment in people and the development of their competences; they destroy the momentum of teams of researchers working for the benefit of all of us. Professor Lipschutz' editorial refers briefly to the talents his program has developed, and their fruitful use in private industry. The letter which Professor Lipschutz had sent me goes into more detail about how scientists trained in his program are employed in industry. The letter together with the editorial show how these cuts are likely to work against, not for, economic recovery.

At this point, I want to pause for a moment to discuss an argument often made against basic research. The argument goes something like this—if industry really needed these new techniques they would just develop them; or they would pay someplace like Purdue to develop them. So why do we need a planetary program and other basic research? The answer is so simple as to be almost tautological: If industy knew what to do, in each specific case, they would do it. Often they do not know what to do. The valuable and efficient principle of maximizing profits means that almost all industrial staff are focused on their existing processes and technologies and clearly forseeable improvements to them. If a new direction is needed, involving a fundamental improvement, it is likely to come from outside. History records this again and again.

So there is a need for vigorous programs exploring and creating new science and technololgy as a seedbed for innovation. Economic recovery is not merely a matter of statistics and correlations. There needs to be new, real, substantial economic activity. Shuffling hollow numbers may hide problems for awhile, but if there is no creation of new wealth, the shuffling eventually will be revealed as merely cosmetic. The technology Professor Lipschutz creates leads to a real increase in our wealth.

Surely, there is a need to get the Government off the backs of the people, but we must have the understanding to realize that not all Government programs are burdens.

Mr. Speaker, because I believe that the editorial and letter by Professor Lipschutz will help us achieve this understanding, I include them in the RECORD for the benefit of all Members.

PURDUE UNIVERSITY, DEPARTMENT OF CHEMISTRY,
December 14, 1981.

Hon. DONALD FUQUA,
Chairman, Committee on Science and Technology, Rayburn House Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I am writing at this time to offer some information which, I believe, should be considered in your deliberations on the FY 1983 NASA Authorization Bill. Essentially, I argue that a generally unrecognized by-product of basic research in the Space Sciences are new Ph.D.'s. Because of the nature of their training, these Ph.D.'s are extremely valuable and are eagerly sought for research and production activities in modern high-technology industries. I describe some specifics below.

Since 1965, when I joined the Purdue Chemistry Department, I and my research group spent a considerable portion of our efforts on developing accurate and sensitive techniques for analyzing certain metals present in stony meteorites in extremely low or ultratrace concentration levels. Today, we are the only group in the world carrying out such analyses. The most important part of this research from our standpoint is the coherent interpretation of the analytical data to understand the formation of solid objects in the solar system. Thus the dozen or so Ph.D.'s who have gone through my laboratory have had to learn (and develop) new techniques and, more importantly, a way of thinking about chemical processes in the world as it exists, not as it appears in a "clean" laboratory system.

Today, most of my former students are not engaged in space research but, rather, are in industrial laboratories, using their knowledge and talents in such diverse projects as the production of solid-state devices and petroleum exploration. For example, one who obtained his Ph.D. in 1981 is the process control chemist for the production of large-system computer circuit boards and of high-purity silicon chips for an IBM plant in New York. His job is to set up and supervise the operation of complex, continuous flow analytical systems to assure that solid-state devices being produced contain appropriate amounts of necessary trace constituents and are free of others that would degrade the performance of these devices. Another, who obtained his Ph.D. in 1978, is using trace elements geochemistry in petroleum exploration. Certain trace elements are known to be geochemical markers of the presence of petroleum, as may be other chemical characteristics. This former student established a trace element laboratory for Shell in Texas and is engaged in analyzing drill cores for known and possible markers of petroleum. His geochemical knowledge and some of the techniques he uses were established during his Ph.D. research.

I could cite other analogous cases but these two should suffice. Essentially as the result of basic research in Space Science, scientists have been acquired unique knowledge and techniques which are being applied to modern-day, high-technology industrial problems. They could not have acquired this training in any other way and such training is, today, very rare. Indeed, within the past two months recruiters for three other companies have visited my laboratories asking to speak to my current students who are within three years of completing their Ph.D.'s. These companies have needs now but cannot fill them.

In the past 5-6 years, funding in the Space Sciences and in other areas have been cutback so severely as to cripple basic research. I appreciate that in these economic times, all budgetary requests must be evaluated even more carefully than in the past. The intent of the Administration proposals for FY 1983 is for economic recovery. However, if they are enacted, they will complete the destruction that other Administrations began. I, for one, and others will be forced to terminate our research activities. Who, then, will train new Ph.D.'s to participate in and, indeed, create this economic recovery?

I believe that this is a critical juncture in history. The economic needs of our Nation in both the short and long term argue for immediate increased funding for basic research—not constant, reduced or no funding. These last are equivalent in my judgement; the only question is how rapidly will occur the destruction of our ability to produce personnel with the knowledge and training necessary to sustain or improve our advanced technological base. I trust that you will include this in your consideration of the FY 1983 NASA Authorization Bill. If I can be of any help, please feel free to call upon me.

Sincerely,

MICHAEL E. LIPSCHUTZ,
Professor and Head of Inorganic Chemistry.

THE SAVAGING OF THE SPACE PROGRAM

(By Michael E. Lipschutz)

WEST LAFAYETTE, INC.—Last month I sat down with my research staff—eight talented young scientists—and told them what the latest round of proposed cuts in space-science funding will do to their careers. It was a somber meeting.

On Dec. 2, President Reagan's science adviser, George Keyworth, indicated the administration plans to cut back NASA funding so severely that early in 1983 the United States will no longer have a Solar System Exploration Program. The public is most familiar with this program through such missions as Voyager I and II that passed the planets Jupiter and Saturn and are now en route to Uranus.

Under presidents Ford and Carter, space-science funding was curtailed, and this, coupled with inflation, removed all but the barest bones from the Solar System Exploration Program. The program cost $175 million for basic research in fiscal 1981—about 88 cents per person in the United States. NASA directed $9 million of that sum to the Planetary Materials Program, which supports all studies on meteorites, lunar samples, cosmic dust and even some terrestrial samples. What the present administration proposes would destroy even these bare bones.

Please understand that research money is not parceled out arbitrarily. Only the best science can be and is funded. Scientists in U.S. universities and research centers submit proposals describing their research and its significance to NASA. NASA in turn sends these proposals to experts for evaluation.

My research program passed all of these hurdles, and for the past few years my research group conducted research on meteorites and lunar samples for about $73,000 annually. What were these funds used for? They were used to pay salaries to those students I talked to; that is, for graduate students doing research for their PhD degrees, for co-workers who already have PhDs but want to learn new techniques and approaches, and for a small portion of my salary. These funds bought chemicals and equipment. In other words, the money was spent on Earth, in the United States.

What did these funds produce? They produced a lot of knowledge on the genesis and evolution of solid objects during formation of the solar system, on the behavior of matter at high temperatures and pressures, on the nature of the solid state and on the Antarctic; they could produce a lot more knowledge. I won't dwell on this because the absolute worth of knowledge is incalculable. I will point out, however, that these funds led to the discovery of two processes; a method for producing industrial diamonds artificially, which is being used in this country and abroad, and a technique for extracting elements from the earth or in space that ultimately may prove very useful.

Knowledge gained was taken to the classroom, where undergraduates learned that science can be understood and applied. Finally, the funds led to the production of about 10 students with PhD degrees. Today, most are working for such companies as IBM, Shell and Procter and Gamble, not in space research. These former students are using the knowledge and techniques they learned at Purdue to produce better solid-state devices, develop improved catalysts for chemical reactions and explore energy sources.

In anticipation of the administration's termination of Solar System Exploration, most research grants for fiscal 1982—my own included—have been cut severely. Some were terminated. All of these grants survived intense scrutiny and all were deemed to be very important scientifically. Officials in NASA and the National Science Foundation are trying desperately to keep as many productive groups as possible functioning at a "starvation level" this year in hope that public pressure will cause the administration to reconsider its decision to terminate Solar System Exploration.

If nothing is done now, solar-system exploration is dead in this country, at least for the next few decades. It will cost much more to resurrect this program later than to continue it now. Worse still, the United States will have handed over world leadership in space to others.●

PRESIDENT'S STATE OF THE UNION LEAVES MANY QUESTIONS UNANSWERED

HON. ANTONIO BORJA WON PAT

OF GUAM

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 2, 1982

● Mr. WON PAT. Mr. Speaker, speaking as chairman of the Subcommittee on Insular Affairs, I have to publicly express my concern over portions of President Reagan's state of the Union address.

Let me add, however, that the President deserves our applause for his efforts to tackle a number of serious problems facing this Nation. I have never questioned Mr. Reagan's sincerity nor his desire to keep America strong. He has proven himself to be an able leader who has confidence in his programs and his goals.

I only wish I could share some of his confidence in the goals he is pursuing. I do share his deep concern over the manner in which we manage the taxpayers dollars. Clearly, something has to be done to control rampant spending and Government waste. President Reagan has made a laudable start in these directions, yet I sincerely question whether his destination is where this country should be heading.

There is nothing wrong with turning over control for many programs to the States. I have the utmost confidence in the ability of local communities to address their needs on an individual basis rather than trying to meet the standards set by Washington. But I do not think that we are going about this in the right manner nor do I believe that we have really thought through what we are committing this Government to do in the next few years.

This fact is extremely important to the Nation's poor and my own constituents who have, for better or worse, come to depend on the Federal Government for a large part of their local governmental support. No one I know likes welfare. We on Guam certainly find it contrary to our traditions, nor do we like to be heavily dependent on the U.S. Government for so much of our local funding for various programs. But this dependence is based on many factors, not the least of which is a lack of viable alternatives.

The President's state of the Union address does not indicate in any way how he intends to deal with the nearly 4 million Americans who live outside the 50 States. While I certainly understand that he has many pressing problems, until I see more information, I must remain alarmed over the possibility that the U.S. territories will suffer a disproportionate reduction in Federal spending and Federal logistical support at a time when their local economies are daily sinking into an abyss of despair.

I am equally disappointed with the failure of the President to enunciate a new policy toward the Pacific. He is deservedly proud of the work this administration has carried on with developing a Caribbean initiative. This is essential to the U.S. long-term interests in the Caribbean. It is regrettable, however, that my calls for a Pacific initiative have not been adopted. This Nation is a Pacific power. We should have learned in World War II that we cannot afford to ignore events in the Pacific. Yet, I believe that we are doing just that, preferring instead to turn our attention to an area filled with crisis when we could be acting now to prevent similar events in the Pacific.

This administration has used a number of buzz words such as waste, fraud, big government, strong defense, quite well in gaining public support. But without a sound policy designed to help Americans who are locked in a system they did not ask for or design, is asking for trouble down the road. Cutting spending may sell with the voters until they realize that many of the things they have found to be essential are gone. I ask Mr. Reagan on behalf of the territories just what are the alternatives you propose for us? You are absolutely right in demanding responsible Government. But responsibility is a two-way street. I believe that Americans in the territories are willing to be responsible. But they also want to know that Uncle Sam has not abandoned his responsibilities in the process.●

NUCLEAR ENERGY POLL

HON. EDWARD J. MARKEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 2, 1982

● Mr. MARKEY. Mr. Speaker, if ever there were any doubts about the growing public distrust of nuclear power, a recent opinion poll conducted by the Associated Press and NBC News makes it crystal clear that nuclear power no longer is viewed as a safe answer for our energy problems.

The poll, conducted November 16-17, with a sampling of 1,602 adults, found that a majority of the American public—56 percent—does not approve of construction of more nuclear plants. This opinion was the reverse of findings 4½ years ago, when nearly two-thirds of those polled favored new nuclear power facilities.

Here are the questions asked in the poll and the breakdown of responses in both the November poll and a similar poll in June 1977:

NUCLEAR ENERGY

Do you think the future energy needs of the United States would be better served by expanding nuclear power, or would they be better served by more conservation and expansion of other energy sources?

November 1981:

Expanding nuclear power, 18 percent.

More conservation and expansion of other sources, 63 percent.

Both (volunteered), 8 percent.

Not sure, 11 percent.

Do you think that more nuclear power plants should be built in the United States, or do you think they should not be built?

November 1981:

Should be built, 32 percent.

Should not be built, 56 percent.

Not sure, 12 percent.

June 1977:

Should be built, 63 percent.

Should not be built, 25 percent.

Not sure, 12 percent.

Would it worry you to live within ten miles of a nuclear power plant, or wouldn't it worry you?

November 1981:

Would worry, 58 percent.

Would not worry, 35 percent.

Already live near one (volunteered), 5 percent.

Not sure, 2 percent.●

NATIONAL TELECOMMUNICATIONS CONSUMERS BOARD ACT

HON. RONALD M. MOTTL

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 2, 1982

● Mr. MOTTL. Mr. Speaker, there can be no doubt that the proposed settlement of the Department of Justice's antitrust suit against A.T. & T. is good for A.T. & T. and its shareholders. Under this agreement, A.T. & T. is being permitted to run off with the "cookie jar" and leave behind the crumbs for the local operating companies. That "cookie jar," containing such things as long distance, the Yellow Pages, pay phones, and WATS, was paid for by ratepayers who are entitled to compensation.

The Justice Department has chosen, through this proposed agreement, to protect the financial security of A.T. & T. without providing equal assurances for the financial security of the average residential telephone consumer. This action illustrates vividly the need for these residential telephone consumers to organize on their own behalf and raise their collective voice about the Nation's telecommunications policy.

The Justice Department's antitrust division is not the only vanquished victim that has fallen before the mighty Bell giant. The members of the Federal Communications Commission who decided to grant A.T. & T. everything it asked for last year in approving a 12.75 percent rate of return have been little more than marionettes dancing to strings deftly maneuvered by Bell. The videotape of this FCC rate proceeding which was made public as a result of my request showed what a cruel joke the FCC has become in its dealing with A.T. & T. I filed a petition for reconsideration of this outrageously high rate of return with my colleague ED MARKEY of Massachusetts but the FCC reviewed the petition and conveniently decided it had been right all along. A GAO report released last year also blasted away at the FCC's ineptness in fulfilling the functions delegated to it by Congress. I chaired a telecommunications field hearing in Cleveland, August 18, investigating Bell's pricing of equipment and services and I found that Ohio Bell had run roughshod over the Ohio Public Utilities Commission in getting approval for its migration strategy. Migration is a marketing policy that forces Bell customers to buy expensive new equipment even when they don't want to. It's plain to see that consumers need more protection in telecommunications matters than they have been getting.

I am today introducing a bill which, when enacted, will enable consumers to have such a voice. This bill, the National Telecommunications Consumers Board Act, authorizes the creation of a not-for-profit corporation which will represent solely the interests of residential telephone consumers. It will provide such representation at no cost to the taxpayers, nor will it create any Government bureaucracy. Instead, the legislation permits the consumer corporation to invite consumers to join it through enclosures sent along with monthly telephone bills. This piggybacking procedure allows the corporation to keep its own mailing costs to a minimum and does not increase the mailing costs to the telephone company. It is an efficient mechanism for using the extra available space in the billing envelope. Furthermore, it is a small request to make when compared to the impressive arsenal of successful enterprises A. T. & T. has developed at ratepayers' expense.

Today, we hear more and more about how Government can no longer pick up the tab for providing consumer services. The supplysiders tell us that it is time for private enterprise and individual effort to reclaim functions usurped by Government. These individuals should be pleased by the legislation I am introducing today. It provides for no Government handout. Instead, the bill demands that the consumer corporation stand or fall upon its own enterprise. It must raise its own funds, govern itself (through a board of directors elected by the membership) and pay its own way. If it fails in the marketplace—it will not survive. If it succeeds, consumers will be well represented at no cost to the taxpayers, the telephone companies, or their shareholders.

I call upon all Members of Congress, both liberal and conservative, to give this bill their serious consideration. It provides an inexpensive and efficient mechanism for giving consumers a voice in the Nation's telecommunications policy and deserves to become an integral part of any telecommunications legislation enacted by Congress.●

DWANE L. WALLACE, RECIPIENT OF 1981 WRIGHT BROTHERS MEMORIAL TROPHY

HON. DON H. CLAUSEN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 2, 1982

● Mr. CLAUSEN. Mr. Speaker, as many of my colleagues are aware, the recipient of the 1981 Wright Brothers Memorial Trophy was Dwane L. Wallace, previously the president and then chairman of the board of the Cessna Aircraft Co.

This award is annually presented to an individual who has made outstanding contributions to the advancement of aviation and space flight and Mr. Wallace's credentials clearly demonstrate that he is truly one of the great pioneers in the aviation industry.

His many engineering, management and leadership skills have played a large part not only in the development of general aviation but have also contributed to the advancement of air transportation at home and abroad.

Because this award recognizes one of the giants of the aviation industry, I believe his remarks on receiving this award should be printed in the RECORD. In this way, not only will Mr. Wallace be further recognized for his contributions but his views and insights on the problems facing aviation today will be made available to my colleagues and the public at large.

Among the major problems Mr. Wallace mentions are the continuing loss of more and more airports throughout the country. The lack of adequate reliever airports in many areas and the need for a concerted effort to open up military facilities to joint civilian use wherever possible.

I agree with his assessment of these problems and as ranking minority member of the Public Works Committee, I and the rest of my colleagues have attempted to address them in H.R. 2643, the Airport and Airway Improvement Act of 1981.

If adopted, this legislation would substantially increase Federal funding for reliever airports as well as require a joint DOD-DOT report to the Congress on the feasibility of opening up military airfields to civilian aircraft. In addition, the bill would greatly enhance the integrated airport system concepts which I have been advocating for many years.

By encouraging the joint planning of airport improvement projects in our metropolitan areas, we can assure that all development undertaken will be consistent with local needs, provide access to the community for all segments of aviation and assure that sufficient capacity will exist in the future to safely accommodate the growth of the aviation industry.

I would like to again extend my congratulations to Dwane Wallace for receiving the award and commend his remarks to you, a copy of which is presented below:

REMARKS OF DWANE L. WALLACE

I am very proud to receive this great honor. This recognition is beyond anything I ever envisioned.

We all wonder at times if we were born 30 years too soon or 30 years too late. After reflecting on this, I consider my timing very fortunate—because it spans the era from the "jenny" to the jet. Even more meaningful to me personally—it spans the era from the 1934 Cessna Airmaster to the Cessna Citation III—which will soon be certified at cruising speeds up to mach .83 and altitudes up to 51,000 feet. It also spans the period from the first general aviation airplanes—then just a novelty associated with exhibitions at county fairs and barnstorming—to the present position of the industry. General aviation airplanes are now a vital and established part of the world-wide air transportation system.

Progress in general aviation has been very gratifying to all who have been involved—but, I think the past is just a prologue—because the future is where the real excitement and real progress lies.

The industry has experienced problems of one kind or another over its entire history—they all loomed large at the time—but, solutions were found and progress continued. Just in recent years, the oil embargo of 1973, and only awhile back, the fuel shortages. At the moment, the air traffic control situation is of great concern. I have great confidence in the present management of the DOT and the FAA, and I am sure of their awareness as to what caused this unfortunate situation. They recognize there were two sides to the coin—and both sides were tails. But, with the cooperation, input, and patience by all—this, also, will pass—and we will end up with a greatly improved and more efficient system. I guess I have always been the proverbial optimist—maybe that is the reason I stayed in aviation—and, I do not plan to change at this point in life.

But, an old problem continues to haunt us—one that we have talked about for years and done far too little about. That is the problem of the disappearing airport. It is a serious situation and should be our highest priority—now and long term. Airports are the key item—for the continued accelerated growth of air transportation—which is—general aviation and the commerical airlines. And, I submit to you, the economy of this country and the world is heavily dependent on a viable air transportation system.

It is no mystery why privately-owned urban airports are disappearing. Urban growth is surrounding them and airport owners are being besieged by real estate developers who are willing to pay a premium for airport land as locations for commercial and residential projects.

In the meantime, airport property taxes have been driven up, and inflation is running up operating costs. The airport owners face a tough economic decision—and, many are deciding to sell the land and take their captial gains. So, these airports are gone forever—and good, convenient locations for new ones are becoming extremely difficult to find.

Let's take the Chicago area as a case in point. I select Chicago because the flow to and from O'Hare affects the air traffic from coast to coast. All other hub areas have similar effects but only to a lesser degree. Reliever airports in all these areas are vital and we just cannot afford to lose another airport. In the Chicago area, Sky Harbor, Chicagoland and others are gone. Only Pal-Waukee, Dupage, Midway and Meigs remain as viable relievers. Meigs was only recently threatened to be byrne'd out—that is spelled by' not bu.' Pal-Waukee, ideally located, just 7 miles north of O'Hare, is privately owned. This airport, like scores of others in big city areas, requires urgent and immediate attention—not next year or the year after—but now.

With 3-billion unallocated in the Airways and Airport Trust Fund—generated by airline ticket tax and general aviation fuel tax—money is available to solve the problem. Spending a small part of these funds would not only save these airports—but, upgrade them for more efficent use.

I believe general aviation is willing to continue paying a fair and reasonable fuel tax to assist in funding the solution of this critical problem—long term. Opinions expressed here tonight are strictly my own. So, I will express another—general aviation fuel taxes could be two-tier—one for aviation gas and one for jet fuel. It is logical and it is justifiable.

Now, Back to Chicago—Glenview Navy Airbase—only 7 miles northeast of O'Hare, is prime location, like Pal-Waukee as a reliever airport. Every time I fly into the Chicago area, this fine airport at Glenview seems almost deserted. In my judgment, it is long past due that it serve as a joint-use facility.

There is a significant number of military bases throughout the country that should be joint-use airports. We have talked about this for years—it is time to quit talking and act.

Everything I have spoken to and about airports will be a big asset to the military—because it will give them greater flexibility, especially in a time of emergency.

Interfaced with my comments about airports is the growing, nagging problem of curfews. It is amazing how an airport attracts developments like a magnet—by the way, this must also prove to the worst skeptic that an airport is a public benefit.

Then it seems like the day after they move in the phone rings and they are complaining about the noise. I never could figure out these people—but, it happens every time. While we continue our efforts to educate the airport's neighbors, we also should keep looking in the mirror. These tail-pipe jets and high-tip speed props are "ear splitting"—let's face it. We should stop dragging our feet—we have known the answer for a long time—it is fan jets and slower turning props. I might add that the military share in this responsibility—the KC-135 is a prime example. Fan-jet engines would not only make them acceptable neighbors, but, also would save a bunch of fuel. I hope we work harder at both ends of the noise problem.

I have great concern about the subjects alluded to here tonight. I am convinced that general aviation will do its full share in the job of moving forward to their timely solution.

In accepting this honor tonight—it must be shared fully with all the wonderful people I have worked with at Cessna for almost 50 years. At the beginning only a few—at the end of the first year, a total of 7—but, now many thousands in the Cessna plants and in the dealer organizations . . . and I must share it fully with the wonderful woman who has worked with me from those early days, my wife, Velma.

I want to thank all the people here tonight for having taken time out of their busy schedules—many traveling long distances—to be here. Velma and I will be forever grateful—we are highly honored by your presence.●

COL. FLOYD J. THOMPSON, U.S. ARMY

HON. G. WILLIAM WHITEHURST

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 2, 1982

● Mr. WHITEHURST. Mr. Speaker, on Friday, January 29, 1982, in a quiet ceremony in the Pentagon the Secretary of the Army awarded the Distinguished Service Medal to Col. Floyd J. Thompson, USA, in appreciation for his 25 years of service to this country as an Army officer. Colonel Thompson has the distinction of being this country's longest held POW returnee.

After his return from Vietnam, Colonel Thompson devoted his efforts to improving the Army's survival training and leadership programs. He was instrumental in developing modifications to the Military Code of Conduct, in the hope that others would gain from his experience. Unfortunately, a dibilitating stroke has brought an end to what he had hoped would be a full 30-year Army career, and he was medically retired effective December 31, 1981. The Army and the country have lost the services of a true American hero, and I extend my deepest appreciation to Colonel Thompson for his service, devotion, and sacrifices in the name of this country's defense.

I would like to share with my colleagues the citation that accompanied the Distinguished Service Medal which was awarded to him, along with Colonel Thompson's remarks on that occasion. I think that his comments are both appropriate and inspiring.

The President of the United States of America, authorized by Act of Congress, July 9, 1918, has awarded the Distinguished Service Medal to Col. Floyd J. Thompson, Infantry, U.S. Army for exceptionally meritorious service in positions of great responsibility:

Col. Floyd J. Thompson dsitinguished himself by outstandingly meritorious service to the United States Army while serving in a series of assigned duties which clearly demonstrates distinguished performance during the period December 1963 to December 1981. During this period, Colonel Thompson served as a Special Forces Detachment Commander at Fort Bragg, as a Deputy Director of the Infantry School at Fort Benning, and as a staff officer at the United States Army Military Personnel Center and in the Office of the Deputy Chief of Staff for Personnel, Headquarters, Department of the Army. While he made major contributions to these organizations through his leadership skills and professionalism, he made a truly incalculable and remarkable impression on the entire Nation through his nine year internment as a prisoner of war. As the longest held prisoner during the Vietnam era, Colonel Thompson demonstrated truly magnificent powers of faith, physical endurance, and trust in the Nation during years of almost unfathomable deprivation and hardship. That he merged from this experience with a determination to continue to serve and to share his experience with his fellow Americans, no matter how uncomfortable to him personally, is a true testament to his indomitable spirit and belief in his country. The value and dimension of Colonel Thompson's many accomplishments, singular dedication to duty, and overall extaordinary and distinguished performance represent meritorious achievement and distinction in the most honored and cherished traditions of the United States Army.

STATEMENT OF COL. FLOYD J. THOMPSON, USA, RETIRED

I am honored to receive this award today, but at the same time, I am saddened to be leaving active military service. The Army has been my life, and I am proud of each of my 25 years of service.

Of those 25 years, I spent nine as a Prisoner of War. Those days were grim, and survival was a struggle. I was able to withstand that long agony because I never lost my determination to live—no matter how painful that became—because I love my country and never lost faith in her, and because I had dreams of what life would be like upon my return to America. Those dreams were always, unquestionably, of a life that was Army. I found that the dream of continued service gave me a goal that helped me survive my years as a POW.

After my return from Vietnam, the opportunity to serve became the motivating force in my life. Military service has given me my greatest challenges and my greatest rewards. I have worked hard for sound leadership development in the Army and for realistic training. The greatest problem faced by POWs was fear of the unknown. This fear can be reduced, not only for the potential POW, but across the awesome environment of the battlefield, by training which is honest enough to address the real issues of combat and which is tough enough to approximate battlefield conditions.

No, I do not now retire freely—there was much that I still wanted to do, but circumstance presents me no alternative. I leave active military service because I must. But, for the rest of my life, the Army will be no less a part of me and what I am than it has always been. Thank you.●

GUAM REMEMBERS FDR

HON. ANTONIO BORJA WON PAT

OF GUAM

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 2, 1982

● Mr. WON PAT. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pride that I join my colleagues in commemorating the 100th anniversary of the birth of Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

The legacy of social concern he left behind has helped nurture my constituents on Guam years after that great man left this Earth. We, on Guam, cherish particularly fond memories of President Roosevelt because, under his leadership, American forces came back in 1944 to drive the Japanese from our shores and again return us to the protection of the U.S. flag.

During my years in elected office, I have been proud to be called a Democrat. In fact, one of the major motivations which led me to found the Democratic Party on Guam was the simple fact that the Democratic Party was the party of Franklin Roosevelt. To posterity, he has left a proud tradition of concern for our fellowman. And to his fellow Democrats, he has left us with the desire to follow in his footsteps and to assure that the programs he brought about will not be dismantled.

Last week, I had the great pleasure of listening to some wonderful comments about President Roosevelt from men and women who personally knew and worked with that great man. I was most impressed with the speech of my good friend, Congressman CLAUDE PEPPER of Florida, who served in the Senate during the Roosevelt years. In a manner most erudite, Congressman PEPPER brought back to life the wonderful image of Roosevelt. He helped all of us remember why the Roosevelt programs were so successful and why he is cherished by so many today.

I think that we need to be reminded of these facts. Today, we see the Roosevelt legacy being attacked and this time successfully. There are those who would have us believe that the business of government is not the welfare of all of its people. They would have us believe that people deserve what they get in life. And the poor deserve to be poor.

That kind of twisted reasoning is not new. But what is new is the failure of so many people to remember what it is like to be poor, to be helpless, to be locked into a manner of life that forever binds you to poverty, ignorance, and hopelessness. President Roosevelt, perhaps because of his own personal tragedy with polio, recognized the need to help these people. He knew that America belonged to all of its people. Not just to the successful, or the rich, or even to those who happen to live in one of the 50 States. The dream that is America belongs to all of our people and, in some respects, to the entire world. If we turn our backs on a substantial segment of our population, have we then not turned our backs on the concepts of an America which has worked together to rise from a depression and a world war to become a truly great Nation?

We need to make adjustments in our programs but these should be done in a compassionate manner consistent with the traditions of President Roosevelt. This would be the best monument to this great man. Thank you.●

AMBASSADOR MIKE MANSFIELD'S SPEECH TO FOREIGN CORRESPONDENTS' CLUB OF JAPAN

HON. CLEMENT J. ZABLOCKI

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 2, 1982

● Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the Members' attention the following speech which U.S. Ambassador to Japan Mike Mansfield delivered to the Foreign Correspondents' Club of Japan earlier this month.

The Ambassador's remarks provide a clear analysis of the trade difficulties between the United States and Japan and should help us all understand why there are frictions in our economic relations with Japan:

ADDRESS BY AMBASSADOR MIKE MANSFIELD

Before beginning my prepared remarks, I would like to say a few words on Japan's draft defense budget for Japan Fiscal Year 1982. That budget is 2,586.1 billion yen, or 11.8 billion dollars, and is an increase of 7.754 percent over JFY 81. I share completely Secretaries Haig and Weinberger's high regard for this special effort on the part of Japan in the defense field. It is all the more impressive when we recognize the Japanese government's efforts to maintain current spending levels in various other programs. The latest Japanese defense budget represents an important step towards establishing a needed self-defense capability.

The 7.57 percent increase over Japan Fiscal Year 81 represents a 4.62 percent increase in real terms, according to GOJ calculations. That is a rate of increase comparable to or much better than those of our other allies, albeit from a smaller base. It is particularly significant at a time when the increase of the GOJ's general expenditure account, from which the various ministries' budgets are drawn, has been held to an average of 1.8 percent—the lowest rate of increase since World War II. The defense budget will also account for 0.933 percent of the estimated fiscal 1982 GNP. This is an improvement in the pattern of the past five years, when defense spending hovered at 0.9 percent of GNP.

The draft budget includes a 25 percent increase in what we term cost-sharing—the Japanese contribution to the improvement of facilities used by US military forces in Japan. It provides for acquisition of major equipment such as 23 F-15's, 7 P-3C's, 3 destroyers, 34 type-75 155mm self-propelled howitzers and 13 203mm self-propelled howitzers. These are welcome additions. However, if the GOJ is to achieve by JFY 1984 the equipment levels called for in the Mid-term Operation Estimate, it will of course have to make significantly greater efforts in the next two fiscal years as well.

I am delighted to have this opportunity to be with you today before we leave for consultations and other commitments and some home leave in the United States. We will be back around the first of March.

I wish I could truthfully say that this New Year will be a prosperous one, free of friction in our bilateral economic relationship and in our mutual relations with third countries. I do not want to be overly pessimistic or melodramatic. Our fundamental relationship is sound and, in our overriding mutual interest, we must keep it that way. But I will confess to being uneasy and concerned as I assess what may be ahead of us in the months to come. It is this assessment which I want to share with you today.

We are in a critical period. The economies of Western Europe and the United States are in recession, perhaps the deepest in the post-war period. Japan itself is experiencing slow growth, avoiding a deeper recession largely on the strength of its exports. We are, I hope, in the final throes of adjustment to the turbulent decade of the 70's—characterized economically by relative stagnation, high inflation, misplaced domestic priorities and a dramatic increase in energy costs. Japan has adjusted better than most. It is rightly envied for its success for which it should not be penalized. Instead, Japan should share its success.

The root cause of economic friction between Japan and North America and between Japan and Europe is the belief that Japan's success results in large measure from a freer and fairer access to world markets than others have to Japan's market. It is not surprising that this belief increases in intensity during periods of economic difficulty and large trade imbalances. In such circumstances it poses a grave risk to Japan. The solution does not lie in protectionism—that will only harm the welfare of all of us. The solution must be found in increased opportunities for foreign access to the Japanese market.

In the past ten years, many barriers to the Japanese market have been lowered. Average tariff rates are generally comparable with those in other industrial democracies. Japan has removed a large number of quantitative restrictions, and progress has been made on other non-tariff barriers such as standards and customs procedures. Nevertheless, access to the Japanese market for imports is much less than would be expected, given this lower level of Japanese tariff and non-tariff barriers. This fact is extremely frustrating to Japan's trading partners.

In current circumstances these frustrations are manifesting themselves in statements critical of Japan. For example, in the United States one hears an increasing crescendo calling on Japan to open up its market, some with implied warnings that the consequences will be severe if no action is taken. A number of bills to restrict Japanese imports have recently been introduced in the Congress. One would require most automobile manufacturers to include at least 30 percent American parts in each vehicle sold in the U.S. A second calls for a tax of two percent of Japan's gross national product be paid annually to the U.S. in compensation for U.S. military expenditures made on behalf of Japan. In addition, one hears suggestions of taxing all Japanese products sold in the U.S.

Personally, I believe that adoption of these measures would be bad policy. And—if we manage things right—their adoption is unlikely. However, we must recognize that these bills, and others like them, are an indication of the fundamental frustration that exists over the difficulties U.S. firms face in penetrating the Japanese market.

As I mentioned earlier we can expect these frustrations to receive the greatest attention when the U.S. is going through a difficult economic period, characterized by high unemployment rates, as it is now. I believe that President Reagan is doing the right things to resolve these problems in the longer term. We will see structural improvement in the domestic U.S. economy as his policies have time to take effect. But we must also see fundamental change in the conditions governing access to the Japanese market if we are to avoid strains in our relations through recurring trade friction of increasing intensity. Also, regardless of what economists might say about the need to view bilateral deficits in their multi-lateral context, a U.S. trade deficit with Japan of around $18 billion in 1981, and perhaps over $20 billion by 1982 is a political fact of life which must be reckoned with. These two factors, when combined with the easier access Japanese products have to our market, cause Americans to question why we can't sell more in Japan in those areas where we are confident of—and have demonstrated—our competitiveness.

In my view the bilateral trade imbalance is not the basic problem—it is only an expression of the real problem. The problem will not be solved by emergency imports alone or the restriction of exports. The fundamental problem will only be solved when and if U.S. and other foreign firms believe they have opportunities for access to the Japanese market equivalent to that which Japanese firms enjoy in the U.S. and elsewhere.

When Deputy U.S. Trade Representative Dave MacDonald was here in December he gave some examples of the kind of disparities in market share that exist between the U.S. and Japanese. Let me repeat them for you. Goods imported from Japan had the following shares of the total U.S. markets:

	Percent
Autos	20
Steel	10 to 15
TV's	20 to 30
Motorcycles	90
Radios	50 to 60
Cameras	over 30
Recording equipment	over 50
Watches	over 50
Machine tools	20

And there are more.

On the other hand, aside from airplanes, there are no manufactured goods imported from the U.S. which enjoy as much as a 10 percent market share in Japan. (Someone is sure to counter by reference to computers. I would point out that 70 percent of IBM's sales in Japan are manufactured in Japan.) I have heard some in Japan express concern about the level of U.S. petrochemical exports to Japan. Yet, the U.S. share in this sector is only 4.5 percent. Some are also concerned that imports of steel into Japan have begun to reach a market share of 2 to 3 percent.

The situation is analogous regarding investment. When the Bank of Tokyo wanted to expand in the U.S., it bought the California First Bank. This gave it immediately over 100 branches in California with full power to accept deposits and act as any other U.S. bank. No American bank could do the same in Japan. When Fujitsu wanted American technology and a foothold in the U.S. market, it bought part of Ampahl. No U.S. company could do the same here. When Green Cross wanted access to American blood plasma, it bought Alpha, the second largest blood collector in the U.S. No U.S. company could do the same here.

Following the Pacific War, Japan understandably took a number of economic measures to protect her industries while they were being rebuilt. Japanese saw Japan as fundamentally fragile and extremely vulnerable both to the forces of nature and to political and economic forces beyond Japan's control. Japan's situation was viewed with a high degree of tolerance by Japan's trading partners. Protectionist measures were considered necessary if Japan was to develop into a strong, viable country able to take its proper place among the industrial democracies, an important goal for the U.S. and the rest of the Free World.

To say that these policies were successful is to understate the case and we applaud that success. Moreover these policies meshed with deeply ingrained Japanese traditions of protection. But today the situation is different. Japan is now a mature economic power, with the obligations which accompany that status. To the rest of the world the image of a "vulnerable Japan" is outdated and no longer a description of Japan in the 1980's. The perceptions of the past—that Japan must limit its imports generally to raw materials, provide the highest possible level of added value in Japan and export completed manufactures—no longer have the same validity. As a mature, strong economy whose economic miracle has largely been possible because of the open international trading system, Japan must now participate fully in that system and work to strengthen it. In short, this means reciprocity by letting others, where competitive, gain market share in Japan by giving them the same kind of free and fair access to the Japanese market that Japan now enjoys in their markets.

I am pleased to see that steps are being taken in this direction. Under the leadership of Prime Minister Suzuki, a process has been undertaken in which possible barriers to market entry are being examined and solutions are being proposed. We welcome the decision to advance Japan's duty reductions negotiated in the MTN by two years. I also believe the actions being taken to stimulate the domestic economy are important. We anticipate that the Diet will in this session address the trade issue in a broad way, recognizing that the national interests of Japan extend beyond that of any particular interest group. But most important of all I am impressed by the growing awareness of the political and business leadership and the mass media of Japan that the potential economic and political risks to Japan are great and could get greater unless the "old ways" of doing things are changed.

We know that there are important domestic constraints on Japanese actions, including the current slow rate of growth in the economy and the budgetary deficit. Other countries, including my own, have similar or even worse problems. I am confident, however, that with firm will, these domestic constraints can be overcome.

I want to stress that both of us bear a responsibility for ensuring that the current trade problem does not reach proportions whereby it causes even more severe strains in our overall relationship. If this were to happen it would be much more difficult for the industrial democracies to deal together with the important problems we face—problems that are crucial to world peace—problems such as Russian troops in Afghanistan, the Polish situation, the concerns of the developing countries, and global negotiations.

As I have often said during my service here, the relationship between the United States and Japan is the most important bilateral relationship in the world—bar none. The trade problem must be seen in the context of this larger relationship, and it is imperative that it not be allowed to be weakened as a result. Although both of us are responsible for managing ourselves through the current trade friction, I must frankly say that the largest part of the decisions lie with Japan. We can point to the problems as we see them, but only Japan can take the actions to solve them. Japan needs to take the lead—for the good of the international trading system and the Western alliance—in finding ways to make the fundamental shifts required so that foreign products have real and fair access to the Japanese market. This will not be easy, but it is crucial.

Before closing, I would like to say just a few words on the costs of protectionism. There have been a number of press stories in Japan in the past several weeks speculating that what Japan's trading partners are really interested in is restrictions on Japanese exports. Speaking for the United States, let me tell you emphatically that this is not the case. Americans have benefitted greatly from Japanese exports, and portions of our business community have been stimulated as a result of these exports. Japanese exports to the U.S. help ensure that the American consumer will have a wide range of choice among quality products at competitive prices.

Similarly, protectionism—whether through high tariffs, non-tariff barriers or other means—has costs for Japan. Consumers have less choice and pay higher prices. Manufacturers pay higher prices for their inputs resulting in higher prices for their output, or lower profits, both of which affect their international competitiveness. Thus, it is not out of some sense of obligation or of doing special favors for an ally that Japan should internationalize its economy. Rather I would argue that it is in Japan's own interest to do so.

As I said, the United States welcomes imports from Japan, and the benefits they bring. When our exporters believe that Japan welcomes their products in the same manner, then and only then will the trade problem begin to be resolved. I know that these are hard words for my Japanese friends and colleagues to hear, but I believe the world economy may be facing its most critical point since the 1930's. Japan cannot afford to look inward. It is crucial, for Japan and for the world, that this problem be resolved. Working together, we can—and must—succeed.●

THE 100TH ANNIVERSARY OF MALDEN, MASS.

HON. EDWARD J. MARKEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 2, 1982

● Mr. MARKEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to bring to the attention of my colleagues in the House a very special celebration in my native city of Malden, Mass., which is observing its 100th anniversary as a city this year.

As a lifelong resident of that city and its Representative in this Chamber, I am especially proud to join with all of Malden's citizens as we look back and reflect on this community's long and distinguished past.

Malden, which was incorporated as a city on March 31, 1881, actually dates back to 1649, when the town of Malden was established. Our community was one of the original sections of Charlestown and one of the first settled regions of Massachusetts to separate from its mother town and create its own government.

Malden takes its name from a community in Essex, England. Some of the most prominent of Malden's original citizens immigrated from that British town. As Malden grew in population over the years, however, the community welcomed immigrants from many other nations as well. Many of these new residents found Malden a refuge from religious and political persecution and from the economic hardship of their homelands.

Today, Malden has a population of 55,000 and supports more than 800 businesses which provide a wide variety of products and services, from computer printers to childrens' toys.

The city of Malden has been the home of many great men and women, including:

Elisha Slade Converse, the town's first mayor. Better known as the good deacon, he was also the founder of a rubber shoe factory which earned Malden an international reputation as the center of the rubber goods industry;

Harriet Jane Hanson Robinson, the founder of the National Woman's Suffrage Association of Massachusetts. She was the first woman to testify before a congressional committee in Washington on behalf of legislation to allow women the right to vote.

Torbert Macdonald the late Representative to the U.S. Congress, and my predecessor. Better known to his loyal constituents as Torby, he served in this Chamber for more than 22 years. Although he was regarded as one of the most powerful and influential Members, he always maintained close ties to the city of Malden and the people he loved.

David Brickman, a great newspaperman and a leading citizen. He is the driving force behind the city's daily journal, the Malden Evening News, one of the Nation's greatest small-town newspapers.

Walter Kelliher, the mayor of Malden for 16 years. His foresight and determination provided much of the spark for the urban redevelopment which the city is benefiting from today.

We in Malden are very proud of our city and its heritage. It is with deep pride that I call your attention to this city's centennial celebration.●

THE 100TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE FOUNDING OF THE KNIGHTS OF COLUMBUS

HON. LAWRENCE J. DeNARDIS

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 2, 1982

● Mr. DeNARDIS. Mr. Speaker, March 29 of this year marks the 100th anniversary of the founding of the Knights of Columbus. On the same day in 1882, a parish priest of New Haven, Conn., by the name of Father Michael J. McGivney called together a group of his friends for the purpose of establishing a Catholic fraternal organization.

Like most fraternal groups during the latter part of the 1800's, the Knights of Columbus grew rapidly, but unlike many orders that in recent decades have declined or become extinct, the Knights of Columbus has continued to prosper. There are now more than 1 million members in the United States and 1.35 million members in 7,100 local councils throughout the world.

I can think of only one reason for this spectacular success—it must be the appeal of the order's many beneficent works. The purpose of the organization, as stated in its charter, is not only to render aid and assistance to its members, but "to promote and conduct educational, charitable, religious, and patriotic activities" in the community.

The Knights of Columbus has certainly remained faithful to its mission.

The Knights have lent aid and comfort to our soldiers during wartime and to our veterans during peacetime.

They have contributed to the development of young leaders by establishing a youth branch of the order, which currently has over 1,000 circles; by sponsoring almost 1,000 Boy Scout troops; and by providing recreational and educational activities for young people at a cost of millions of dollars each year.

They have lifted the American spirit by establishing a special branch of the fraternity, known as the 4th degree, which has as its chief mission the fostering of patriotism.

And they have helped countless needy people: During the last recorded year alone, the Knights gave more than 9,000,000 volunteer hours and over $32,000,000 for various charitable causes, including aid to the underprivileged and mentally handicapped, religious counseling, medical research, help to Vietnamese refugees, assistance to senior citizens, college scholarships—the list goes on and on.

In tribute to this noble fraternity, I am introducing a resolution acknowledging March 29, 1982, as the 100th anniversry of the founding of the Knights of Columbus and commending them for a century of dedicated public service. To join me in this tribute I call not only on my colleagues who are brothers of the order but on all Members of Congress who wish to show their appreciation for the Knights' tireless service to God, country, community, and family.

The text of the resolution follows:

H. RES. —

Whereas the Knights of Columbus, a Catholic, family, fraternal service organization, was established in New Haven, Connecticut, 100 years ago on March 29, 1982, to render aid and assistance to its members and to the community;

Whereas the Knights of Columbus has grown, on the appeal of its many beneficent activities, to more than one million members in the United States and to 1.35 million members in 7,100 local councils throughout the world;

Whereas the Knights of Columbus provided vital comfort to Allied servicemen during World War I through hospitality huts near the front lines bearing to invitation "Everybody welcome; everthing free";

Whereas such organization continued its assistance to members of the armed services after World War I by providing both job training and employment services to returning veterans;

Whereas the Knights of Columbus has dedicated itself to the development of young leaders by establishing its own youth branch, the Columbian Squires (which currently has more than 1,000 circles), by sponsoring almost 1,000 Boy Scout troops, and by providing recreational and educational activities for youths at a cost of millions of dollars every year;

Whereas such organization's ardent love for country led to the foundation of a special branch known as the Fourth Degree, with about 1,600 assemblies, which has as its chief mission the fostering of patriotism;

Whereas the Knights of Columbus was heavily involved in promoting legislation in Congress to reaffirm the phrase "under God" as part of the Pledge of Allegiance to the Flag;

Whereas the organization has long been dedicated to the principle of people serving people and in the last recorded year gave more than 9.2 million volunteer hours to the community and over 32 million dollars for various charitable and benevolent activities, particularly to the underprivileged and the mentally handicapped;

Whereas the Knights of Columbus is committed to strengthening the family as the basic unit of society and the key to the Nation's strength and well-being; and

Whereas such organization always has been devoted to the moral and cultural as well as the material betterment of the family of man: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the House of Representatives respectfully acknowledges March 29, 1982, as the one hundredth anniversary of the founding of the Knights of Columbus, and commends such organization for a century of dedication to the ideals of charity, unity, fraternity, and patriotism.●

A.T. & T. ANTITRUST SETTLEMENT

HON. HAROLD S. SAWYER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 2, 1982

● Mr. SAWYER. Mr. Speaker, we, as Members of Congress, have a duty to pass telecommunications legislation now. The A.T. & T. settlement eliminates our luxury to spend years updating our national telecommunications policy. If we do not act, the results of the A.T. & T. antitrust settlement will subject our constituents to local telephone rates that will be double or triple what they are now.

Today, I am proud to concur with the remarks made by Eric Schneidewind, the chairperson of the Michigan Public Service Commission. Mr. Schneidewind, with the chairpersons of 11 other State public service commissions, testified before the Energy and Commerce Subcommittee on Telecommunications, Consumer Protection, and Finance on Tuesday, February 2, 1982.

Mr. Schneidewind stated "without legislation, which indeed will deal with regulation, the A.T. & T. settlement will become effective and cause catastrophic rate increases * * * of over $150 per year to the individual consumer." The Michigan Public Service Commission chairman then continued to explain how the failure of the A.T. & T. settlement to address local issues would harm the consumer in Michigan:

1. Under the settlement local companies lose all yellow pages revenue. As a result, an additional cost of $2.10 per month would be passed on to the consumer.

2. Under the settlement local companies lose their ownership of phone equipment in the consumers' homes. As a result, an additional cost of $1.20 per month would be passed on to the consumer.

3. Finally, and most critically, under the agreement, the local companies lose their subsidy from long distance revenue, which currently equals .37¢ on every $1 of long distance service. In addition, the local companies are severely limited what they can charge long distance companies for access to local lines during a long distance call. As a result, local companies will be forced to pass an additional cost of $4 per month on to the consumer.

What those statistics indicate, Mr. Speaker, is that consumers in Michigan, and across the country will face under the antitrust settlement, a minimum additional charge of $7.30 per month to their phone bills for the service they now receive. These conservative figures do not include other costs to the consumer that cannot be analyzed due to the unavailability of the exact terms of the settlement.

We must act now. Judge Green's final determination will not be available until next August at the earliest. Our public service commissioners are experts in evaluating the assets and rates involved, but, under the settlement, neither the public service commissioners nor the local companies have any way to state or protect their interests before Judge Green. The consumer is unrepresented. This is why I support TIM WIRTH's move to act quickly in adopting legislation now. We, as representatives have a duty to address these telecommunications issues. For as difficult as they are, they remain policy issues for Congress, and not merely antitrust issues before the Justice Department.

Mr. Schneidewind presented six principles that must be adopted in legislation in the 97th Congress. Frankly, I do not see how we can face our constituents and their tripling phone rates unless we act to protect them by adopting the following six points:

1. State regulators must be permitted to require an exchange carrier to provide basic telephone equipment and service on that equipment if unregulated entities are not providing such service or equipment.

2. The Yellow Pages operation and the revenues from that operation must be retained by exchange carriers.

3. State regulators must be permitted to decide the disposition of embedded customer premises equipment and station connections.

4. State regulators must be assured that any assets transferred from exchange carriers to a deregulated entity or to AT&T will be priced at fair market value.

5. State regulators must be permitted to set access charges for exchange carriers. In the alternative, an administratively final Joint Board with majority state membership may set access charges. In either case, revenues received from access charges must at the outset equal revenues currently received from the separations and settlements process. In the longer term, market forces and the ability of carriers to bypass the local network may force adjustments in access charges. However, a transition to this situation is paramount if universal service is to be continued and if the telephone network as it presently exists is to be able to survive.

6. Regulators must be allowed authority to set depreciation rates and methodologies for assets that they continue to regulate. Competitive market forces should be considered. But as long as certain services continue to be regulated because of lack of competition or dominance of a carrier in the provision of that service, regulators must be given the authority to determine the acceptability of this significant portion of a carrier's operating costs.

I commend our Michigan Governor William G. Milliken, and our Michigan Public Service Commissioners, Eric J. Schneidewind, Edwyna G. Anderson, and Matthew E. McLogan for working so diligently to bring this important information to our attention. They have my full support.●

NATIONAL POW-MIA RECOGNITION DAY

HON. LES ASPIN

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 2, 1982

● Mr. ASPEN. Mr. Speaker, today I have introduced legislation to declare April 9 of each year as National POW-MIA Recognition Day as a declaration of this Nation's continuing debt to those Americans who have suffered at the hands of foreign enemies and to the sacrifices of their families and the families of those men whose fate remains unknown.

It is especially fitting to remember what we owe to these people on April 9. On that day in 1942, the largest single group of Americans became POW's with the surrender of the troops in Corregidor and the Bataan Peninsula in the Philippines. The ensuing "Death March" of these surrendered American troops was never forgotten by the American soldiers who fought in the Pacific in World War II. "Remember Bataan" became the rallying cry of victory. We, too, should remember today.

The sacrifices of former prisoners of war and their families and the families of those declared missing in action deserve this continuing recognition. There should never be a time in American history when the freedom for which they fought is not felt and appreciated.

I believe this legislation is a fitting tribute from the American people in recognition of those who sacrificed their freedom so that ours would continue.

I hope that my colleagues will join me in sponsoring this legislation and include the text of the bill at this point in the RECORD:

H.J. RES. 393

A bill to provide for the designation of April 9 of each year as "National POW-MIA Recognition Day".

Whereas thousands of Americans have been captured by enemies or declared missing in action in wars in which the United States has been involved;

Whereas many American prisoners of war were subjected to cruel and inhumane treatment at the hands of their captors in violation of international law and convention;

Whereas many Americans died as a result of such treatment and, historically, those that survived continued to suffer to a far greater degree than other veterans of America's wars as a result of such treatment;

Whereas it remains uncertain whether those American soldiers who are still considered to be missing in action have died or are alive and such uncertainty causes hardship and suffering for their families;

Whereas the sacrifices of American prisoners of war, Americans missing in action, and their families are deserving of national recognition; and

Whereas on the ninth of April, 1942, American soldiers comprising the largest single group of such soldiers ever to fall into enemy hands were taken prisoner: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the ninth day of April of each year shall be designated as "National POW-MIA Recognition Day" and the President of the United States is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation each year calling upon the people of the United States to commemorate such day with appropriate activities.●

THE CASE FOR TAX CUTS NOW

HON. GERALD B. H. SOLOMON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 2, 1982

● Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Speaker, there are some Members of Congress who would have us believe that President Reagan's economic policies are to blame for the current recession even though those policies have been in effect only a few short months. This is clearly not true. This sort of talk is based more on political expediency than on intelligent economic analysis.

One of the best analyses of the current economic condition is presented in the January 14 Backgrounder published by the Heritage Foundation. Tom Humbert, a Walker fellow in economics, wrote the Backgrounder. I commend the entire essay to your attention although I am inserting only the introduction at this time:

[From the Backgrounder, Jan. 14, 1982]

THE CASE FOR TAX CUTS NOW

INTRODUCTION

As President Reagan prepares his budget for the 1983 fiscal year, the nation's economic barometers are signalling stormy weather. From both sides of the congressional aisle—even from those who should know better—cries are heard imploring Reagan to abandon his supply-side strategy, in operation less than four months. Yet there are strong arguments for the President to stay resolutely on course. There even are calls for supply-side economics really to be given a chance by accelerating the scheduled tax cuts and not as some critics propose, postponing them.

Although the debate on the Reagan tax cuts occurred less than seven months ago, many seem to have forgotten—even some in the Administration—the fundamental reasons underlying the policy: that high marginal tax rates destroy the kind of productive activities most needed in an economic downturn. The most important barrier to economic recovery today is the heavy load of taxes helping to keep factories idle, investment opportunities unexploited and, ultimately, willing workers unemployed.

Between 1965 and 1975 the average tax rates for the median income earner increased more than 35 percent. Those rates increased an additional 22 percent between 1975 and 1980, mainly due to inflation-induced tax bracket creep. The marginal tax rate faced by the median-income family of four in 1980 was 24 percent. Taking into account Social Security and state tax increases, the marginal tax rate facing the average American family is 40–44 percent.[1] On the average, this amounts to some $10,690 per household. Does anyone seriously think that adding to this burden would create a more healthy economy?

Unless action is taken, however, an already over-taxed economy will be burdened with yet another stiff tax hike in 1982. A Social Security tax increase of $13 billion greeted Americans on January 1 and they can look forward to income tax increases of $28 billion because of tax bracket creep.[2] (See Appendix 1.) The 10 percent personal tax reduction scheduled for July will only offset these automatic tax increases.

The other scheduled cuts are in large part only reductions of planned tax increases. The nature of the U.S. tax system permits massive tax increases to occur automatically because of inflation. No direct legislation is required. Despite the much-publicized "Reagan revolution" in tax policy, the fully implemented tax cut will at best return the nation to the level of taxation in 1978. Even with the cuts, total revenues will increase over $300 billion during the next five years. According to the Congressional Budget Office (CBO), tax levies will rise from $605 billion in 1981 to $923.3 billion in 1986.

And yet many in Congress and the Administration actually propose to reverse the economic slowdown by raising taxes even more. Apparently, the message that taxes are the major cause of our economic malaise has still not been universally learned. Higher taxes do not reduce prices nor fight inflation. Higher taxes do not increase employment nor stimulate economic growth. Rather, tax increases exacerbate the problems of unemployment, low productivity, and economic stagnation.

Accelerating the tax cut would help relieve the heavy tax burden which supply-siders contend is a chief cause of economic deterioration in recent years. More than two dozen Congressmen, spurred by Representatives Jack Kemp (R-N.Y.) and Robert Walker (R-Pa.), are urging the President to speed up the tax cuts by six months. They argue that with over 9 million Americans unemployed and the economy running at only about 75 percent of capacity, fallow resources could be employed by enhancing the incentives for productive work and investment. Tax cuts, not tax increases, they say, generate the long-term prosperity that, among other things, eventually will restrain and then eliminate the deficit. These Congressmen have introduced a bill (H.R. 4999) that would move up the tax cut scheduled for July 1982 to January and the July 1983 tax cut to January 1983. While some hope for the full 25 percent tax rate reduction to be made effective immediately, or, even better, that full indexing of tax brackets for inflation be started now rather than 1985, most supply-siders seem to be coalescing around the Kemp-Walker proposal as a remedy for the current recession.

Supply-siders figure that the quickest way to reduce the burgeoning deficit is to stimulate the economy to recovery, thereby reducing expenditures for social welfare programs and increasing tax revenues. They point out that four-fifths of the recent increase in estimates of the proposed deficit are caused by a deteriorating economy, not by the upcoming tax cut. Expenditures for unemployment compensation, food stamps, and other entitlements have increased rapidly since July, while the economic decline has reduced tax revenues. A reinvigorated economy, however, could quickly eliminate the budget deficit. The CBO estimates that for every one percentage point decline in the unemployment rate, the deficit is reduced $25 billion. A reduction in the unemployment rate from the current 9 percent to 6 percent could nearly wipe out the budget deficit for the coming year. While few think that accelerating the tax cut stimulates economic growth quite this powerfully, most supply-siders think it could shorten the recession and, in the long term, slash the deficit.

Other analysts confirm the basic Kemp-Walker arguments. A U.S. Chamber of Commerce study finds that a six-month speed-up in the personal tax rate reductions would significantly stimulate real economic growth in 1982 and 1983, substantially reduce the unemployment rate, and increase business investment and productivity—without increasing the rate of inflation at all. According to the study, the measure provides taxpayers with more than $16 billion in relief in 1982 and more than $17 billion in 1983.[3] While this falls far short of offsetting all the tax increases scheduled for those years, it does fully offset Social Security tax increases and tax bracket creep.

Tax cuts spur entrepreneurship of small, often unincorporated business by allowing entrepreneurs to retain a greater share of their own earnings. Small business entrepreneurship helps pull the country out of downturns and provides important sources of innovation and employment in times of recovery. Nearly 70 percent of all new jobs come from firms with twenty or fewer employees. In the Northwest, nearly 100 percent come from these miniscule businesses.[4] A tax code which rewards inherently risky entrepreneurial activity encourages an early exit from the current recession and a sustained recovery. David Smick, chief of staff for Congressman Kemp, writes: "Entrepreneurial success in America is taxed and harassed more than in just about any other free industrialized country."[5] Ninety percent of American firms, for instance, pay taxes through personal schedules, either as a partnership or as an unincorporated business activity. A tax cut speed-up should expand the pool of capital available to all businesses, but especially to capital-starved small enterprises. Lately, after the government takes its enormous bite of the available capital, and big business gathers up the rest, there is little left for smaller enterprises. It is likely that much of the increased pool of savings will go to small enterprises now being crowded out of capital markets. and because most small businesses first get their start by borrowing funds from friends, relatives, or small local banks, an acceleration of the personal tax cut could mean more funds from these sources.

Supply-siders feel the additional relief is vitally important to avert a net tax increase that would deepen the recession and cause needless social suffering. "If there is one mistake that the Administration has made in economic policy," Kemp has remarked, "it is in delaying the tax cut." Adds Walker: "The first round of tax cuts does not provide a sufficient measure of relief to the American worker and therefore doesn't provide enough time between the July 1 ten percent reduction and the end of the fiscal year for the economy to snap back in time to show solid evidence of economic recovery." He concludes that "if we have the opportunity to put people back to work we should take advantage of it."●

SENATE—Wednesday, February 3, 1982

The Senate met at 11 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore (Mr. THURMOND).

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, LL.D., D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

God of our fathers and of all peoples everywhere, we need Thee, our cities need Thee, the Nation needs Thee, the world needs Thee. We pray for Thy special blessing upon the "National Prayer Breakfast" and seminars tomorrow. As the President joins with representatives from Federal, State, and local government, with leaders from more than 200 nations and every State in the Union, may the Holy Spirit bring to that microcosm of the world a visitation of divine power, love, and grace. Grant protection and blessings to the President and First Lady, to Vice President and Mrs. Bush, and those who participate in the program. May Thy holy presence be experienced by all in attendance. May all be made aware of the Nations' accountability to Thee for justice, freedom, and peace.

Be with the Senators and all who support them in their public service today. May Thy wisdom enlighten them, Thy power energize them, Thy truth and light guide them, Thy grace encourage them. Let Thy will be done in this place as it is in heaven and grant that all of us may love mercy, do justly, and walk humbly with our God. We ask this in the name of Him whose life incarnated that walk. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Chair.

THE JOURNAL

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Journal of the proceedings of the Senate be approved to date.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE TODAY

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, on last evening, I indicated that today, after the recognition of the two leaders under the standing order and the execution of special orders providing for the recognition of Senators, there be a period for the transaction of routine morning business, then a resumption of the debate on the motion to proceed to the consideration of Senate Resolution 20. I also indicated at that time that I hoped we could find some other business to do today, which would have to be done, of course, by unanimous consent.

I say to my friend, the minority leader, that I have not yet found "some other item of business" that we can transact. I hope if he has some item in mind, we might discuss that in the course of an informal conversation or on the floor and see if we can find something else to do. Otherwise, Mr. President, I expect that this day will be a short day, since we now have a time certain to vote on the motion to proceed tomorrow at noon.

In addition to that, I indicated last evening that I hoped Senators might be willing to undertake a shortening of the time for debate on the Helms-Johnston amendment which will occur as the pending business tomorrow at 11 o'clock. I once again suggest, then, and hope that those who may hear me in their offices will address the question, particularly, on whether or not we can reduce the time for debate so that the vote on the Helms-Johnston amendment will occur immediately after the vote on the motion to proceed, which will be at 12 o'clock. I hope Senators will contact me in that respect and I invite any comments the minority leader may wish to make in that regard.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I wonder if the majority leader, Senator LONG, and others would be willing to reschedule the 12 o'clock vote and have it occur, say, at 12:30 p.m.

Mr. BAKER. Yes, I am perfectly agreeable to that.

Mr. LONG. I have no objection, Mr. President.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have not checked with our people. I wonder if I could have a brief moment while our cloakroom makes a quick check to find out. I am fairly sure that will be satisfactory. I shall withhold making that request for just the moment, but I personally have no objection.

Mr. LONG. May I ask for personal clarification, which vote is it that the Senator wants to set at 12:30? It is all right for me to wait.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. The vote on the motion to proceed, Mr. President.

Mr. BAKER. The minority leader would still have in mind perhaps scheduling the vote on the Helms-Johnston amendment right after the vote on the motion to proceed.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes, I think that would be a good time, Mr. President.

TELEVISION AND RADIO COVERAGE OF SENATE PROCEEDINGS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I hope that after we get on the resolution, if we do get on the resolution, we could schedule a reasonable time for debate and perhaps agree on a time certain to vote on that measure. I do not want to press that point at this time, but if we could do it, I suggest that sometime Monday or Tuesday would be a good time to consider it. I acknowledge that that is probably premature at that time, but I could not resist trying.

Mr. LONG. If the Senator will yield at that point, Mr. President, let me say to the Senator that the Senator from Louisiana will not be able to agree at this point, but he is very pleased at the headway his side made yesterday, having educated Senators who knew nothing whatever about the matter. He finds he has considerable support in one respect or another for the position he takes. I honestly feel the matter should be discussed and that this is an appropriate situation for debate. I am not suggesting that Senators should speak at great length, but I do feel this is an appropriate situation for a proper Senate debate. I could not agree at this moment to that suggestion.

Mr. BAKER. I understood he might not, Mr. President. That is why I took some pains to couch my language in cautious terms. I think yesterday was a good day and I think we have vastly expanded the general knowledge of the Senate and maybe even of others on this subject. I feel good about it. I think our prospects for accomplishing this objective are far better today than they were yesterday. That disagreement between the distinguished Senator from Louisiana and myself is what makes the Senate a great body.

What I would really like to do, at some point after there has been a full airing of the contentions of the parties in this matter and consideration of any measures that may be presented, I would like to resolve it. So, from time to time, I am sure the Senator from Louisiana will not be offended if I once again plant the suggestion that maybe we ought to find a time to vote on this bill.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will at least be fair to those of us who do not agree with his proposal. I think it was inappropriate for the Senator on yesterday, before the Senator from Louisiana had ever had a chance to say the first sentence on behalf of his position, to say that he saw the Senator with some cough drops and he was convinced the Senator was going to filibuster, or some such thing as that—to infer as much, anyway. The Senator from Louisiana, Mr. President, had a sore throat. He had been plagued with it for some days. It is not my fault I have a sore throat. That is something only the good Lord can control.

Mr. BAKER. But the Senator from Louisiana gave me the sore throat and I cannot forgive him for that. I forgive him for every other transgression, but I have the sore throat today and I hope the Senator from Louisiana will share his cough drops.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Tennessee will indulge me with the same charity we grant each other in this Chamber day after day and grant a Senator the right to state what he believes to be right as the Good Lord gives him the light to see it, especially when he prays over it. One should always indulge himself in the assumption that the other fellow might be right.

The Senator has been most kind to hear my presentation even if he did not agree with it. I appreciate the extent to which the Senator has been a good listener.

I say to the Senator that he has a good argument, and though I do not agree with it, I think he made a good speech yesterday. I did not accuse the Senator of filibustering. He did it before the Senator from Louisiana even had a chance to make his opening statement. I think he made a good speech.

I appreciate the Senator's position. I am not beyond reason and I hope the Senator from Tennessee will at least show us the same intellectual consideration that he traditionally does all Members of this body.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I am sure the Senator from Louisiana, more than almost any other Member of the Senate, understands that a part of the cushion, of the padding that prevents the friction that inevitably occurs in this body from being destructive, is a sense of humor.

I believe that the Senator from Louisiana has a sense of humor that is unequaled by any other Member. I cannot recall a greater pleasure in that respect than hearing the endless stories the Senator from Louisiana tells so very well about his life and experience, and of that of his family, in politics.

So he knows, I am sure, speaking of my apprehension that he might proceed at length to debate the motion to proceed, and my observing the presence of a great stock of cough drops, that was said in jest and in good humor. But I must say, in all fairness, as well, that while it is true the Senator had not yet begun to debate the motion to proceed, like almost every other Member in this Chamber, his reputation preceded him.

Mr. President, I am prepared to yield my time remaining under the standing order to any Senator seeking recognition. I see no Senator on my side seeking time.

I am prepared, then, to yield the time to the control of the distinguished minority leader, if he wishes it.

RECOGNITION OF THE MINORITY LEADER

THE PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WARNER). The minority leader is recognized.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the majority leader.

THE RETIREMENT OF JANE PRICE SHARP

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, January 1, 1982, marked the formal retirement of one of West Virginia's best-known journalists, Jane Price Sharp. The editor of the Pocahontas Times since 1957, Mrs. Sharp has worked at the weekly newspaper, off and on, for more than 44 years. Born and reared in Marlinton, W. Va., the home of the Pocahontas Times, Jane Price Sharp comes from a long line of journalists. Her grandfather, the Reverend William T. Price, purchased the Pocahontas Times in 1892 and ran it until 1905. Mrs. Sharp's father, Calvin W. Price, then took over as editor and served in that capacity until his death in 1957. Since that time, the publication of the Pocahontas Times has been accomplished under the watchful eye of Jane Price Sharp.

Running a weekly newspaper has consumed only a portion of Mrs. Sharp's energies, however. She has also found time to serve on the board of directors of the Marlinton Chamber of Commerce, is the director of the Pocahontas County Historical Society, secretary of the Pocahontas Democratic Woman's Club, and a member of the Women of the Press and Sigma Delta Chi. Mrs. Sharp is also past president of the West Virginia State Press Association and the Marlinton Woman's Club.

I am glad that the family tradition at the Pocahontas Times will be carried on by Mrs. Sharp's nephew, Bill McNeel, who has taken over as editor, and her daughter, Jane S. Jessee, the new managing editor.

But Jane Price Sharp is not ready to go into full retirement just yet. Typical of her enthusiasm and drive, I am told she will be helping at the Pocahontas Times from time to time. Jane Price Sharp has made great contributions to her profession and her community, and for her many accomplishments I offer my praise and gratitude.

MINE SAFETY

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, the Washington Post of February 3 contains an article entitled, "Accidents Up, Citations Down in Coal Fields," which will be of interest to my colleagues.

The article deals with two troubling areas—the adequacy of mine inspections in 1981, and the confusion caused by the provision of the continuing resolution that bars the Mine Safety and Health Administration from inspecting stone, sand, and gravel operations.

At a time when fatalities are rising in the coal mining industry, the frequency of inspections appears to be decreasing. Congress should not allow mine safety to be a casualty of the budget process.

The transfer of authority to inspect stone, sand, and gravel operations from MSHA has resulted in a confusing and frustrating situation within MSHA. The ultimate effects of the transfer on safety on both coal and noncoal mines are unknown, but should be examined closely by the Congress.

I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Feb. 3, 1982]

ACCIDENTS UP, CITATIONS DOWN IN COAL FIELDS

(By Douglas B. Feaver)

Federal mine inspectors are issuing fewer violation notices, closing fewer mines for safety reasons and collecting less in fines at a time when fatalities from mine accidents appear to be on the rise.

Twenty miners have been killed in the coal fields since Jan. 1, compared with nine a year ago. A total of 153 miners were killed in 1981, the highest annual rate since 1975.

The Labor Department's Mine Safety and Health Administration (MSHA), which is required to inspect all underground coal mines four times a year, is being squeezed by budget problems just like other agencies.

Unlike everyone else, however, MSHA is also caught in a strange never-never land. A small part of its mission—inspection of sand and gravel and quarrying operations—was moved by Congress in the continuing resolution from MSHA to Labor's Occupational Safety and Health Administration (OSHA). No one knows whether or when that mission will be returned, but OSHA has it until March 31, when the continuing resolution expires.

The result: 220 MSHA sand and gravel quarrying inspectors have been furloughed since Jan. 1. Since many of them are also qualified coal inspectors, they are now beginning to "bump" less senior coal inspectors under federal personnel rules.

"I certainly emphasize with the employes who were impacted," said MSHA Administrator Ford B. Ford, an appointee of President Reagan. "That was not an administration-sponsored move."

Further, attrition and the federal hiring freeze combined to cut by 9 percent the number of coal inspectors actually on the job from 1,389 to 1,264 between the end of fiscal 1979 and fiscal 1981.

"We are losing our best inspectors to industry," according to a source in an MSHA field office. "Previously we could keep them because of the continuity of the work and the dignity of the job, but no longer.

"If you asked, 'Does that account for these disasters?' I would say I hope not, but it troubles me."

Ford said he could not be "definitive" on whether such uncertainties might have contributed to laxness in the field. "A great number of our inspectors come from coal mining and coal mining families. I would say they are doing a good job. I can't say how individuals react."

The statistical evidence is interesting, if not conclusive. It shows that MSHA coal inspectors issued 129,921 citations for violations in fiscal 1980, but only 108,914 in fiscal 1981, a drop of 16 percent.

Orders—where an inspector literally closes a mine or a section of a mine or prohibits use of a piece of equipment until a hazard is corrected—dropped from 5,270 to 4,787, or 9 Percent, from one fiscal year to the next.

Assessments—civil penalties paid by mine operators—dropped from $19.5 million in calendar 1980 to $14.2 million in calendar 1981, or 27 percent.

The General Accounting Office, at the request of Rep. Nick J. Rahall II (D-W.Va.), is three weeks into an investigation of whether MSHA is, in fact, performing the inspections the law requires.

Miners in Rahall's district told him that the Logan, W. Va., MSHA office was not conducting the required number of inspections, according to Rahall spokesman Michael Serpe. Rahall confirmed that charge from MSHA's own statistics, Serpe said, and asked for the GAO probe. "The fact that mine inspections are not being carried out is a travesty of the law that we in Congress worked hard to implement," Rahall said.

MSHA's Ford said that "from the information we've been able to glean, those inspections rquired by the [Coal Mine and Safety] Act are being carried out to the extent those mines are available for inspection." Mines regularly move in and out of production, he said, and if they are out of production there is nothing to inspect.

Ford said that MSHA's inspectors inspect "100 percent of those mines available," but only 92 percent of all 5,700 coal mines because of availability problems. Labor Department statisticians said that the number of inspections that may have been missed (depending on whether the mine was really open or not) jumped from 485 in fiscal 1980 to 887 in fiscal 1981.

The switch from MSHA to OSHA of sand, gravel and stone inspections has the immediate result of removing thousands of small operators from the burden of federal inspection because OSHA is not permitted to inspect firms with fewer than 10 employes unless there is a complaint or a reported accident.

While the resolution transfers about 162,000 protected workers at 12,395 operations from MSHA to OSHA, the inspectors remain on furlough. About 86 percent of the sand and gravel and two-thirds of the quarry operators will be exempt from OSHA enforcement barring a reported accident or complaint, OSHA spokesman Jim Foster said.

The National Sand and Gravel Association was able to build enough support in Congress to win at least temporary freedom from MSHA in the continuing resolution. However, MSHA statistics show, sand, gravel and quarrying operations have accounted for about 50 percent of the fatalities in the non-coal mining industry. Deaths in the non-coal mining industry dropped steadily from 234 in 1972 to an all-time low of 83 last year.

Ford has reorganized MSHA to place education and training staffs under the direct supervision of district managers instead of under Washington. That has resulted in the closing of some MSHA offices in the field, Ford said, but does not mean that MSHA's presence is diminished in any way.

"There has been no message to us to lessen regulatory enforcement," Ford said.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Does any Senator wish a portion of my remaining time?

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I have a statement that might take a little more than 10 minutes, but I should not think it is asking too much to ask the Senate to indulge me in presenting the statement I am prepared to make.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, will the Senator give me the pleasure and honor of yielding the time I have remaining to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes; if the Senator has any time remaining.

Mr. LONG. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the majority leader has expired.

Mr. BAKER. Then, I regret that I am not able to do that. I shall make any provision the Senator from Louisiana requires in that respect.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I yield my remaining time to the Senator from Louisiana.

EL SALVADOR—WHO OWNS THE FUTURE?

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the process of land reform in El Salvador holds great promise for the working people of that country. If properly carried out, it can provide a strong foundation for putting that struggling nation back on a path to peaceful and prosperous economic growth.

It is my hope that this land reform effort will be successful, and that a more equitable and more workable distribution of land will result. At the same time, I hope that we in the United States can learn a lesson from the situation in El Salvador—a situation that is likely to be repeated again and again as struggling people elsewhere attempt to establish democratic governments and escape from poverty.

The lesson that I hope we will learn is the crucial role that ownership plays in the development process. Too often we overlook the long-term consequences of our aid, and of the future impact that aid can have on American foreign policy.

I hope that we will learn to begin asking ourselves, "Who owns the future?" In most developing countries, the vast bulk of the arable land is owned not by a broad cross section of its people but by a relatively small group. That same landed elite generally owns most of the productive capital as well.

Unfortunately, newly created development capital is too often financed in such a way that it becomes owned either by this relatively small class or by the government itself. Neither approach is well-designed to promote the long-term good health of an emerging democratic government.

Capital ownership in the United States is concentrated in a disturbingly similar fashion. According to the Joint Economic Committee, for example, 50 percent of our individually held corporate stock is owned by just 0.5 percent of the U.S. population. Two-thirds, according to a 1976 Internal Revenue Service report, is held by 5.2 percent of the population age 20 and over.

At the other end of the ownership spectrum, we find a sobering statistic provided by the National Bureau of Economic Research. According to their research, for the majority of American families, their most import wealth is now their entitlements under our social security system.

Thus, for most Americans their most important asset is an assurance that their children will be taxed on their behalf. That is a long way down the wrong road for a nation that prides itself on a heritage of private property, and for a nation that hopes to see others adopt private property free enterprise as their dominant political model.

Unfortunately, we did not have that thought firmly in mind when the Congress agreed to legislation targeting approximately $450 billion through 1990 for increased business writeoffs of plant and equipment—all of which will be owned by someone.

In large part, corporate finance will determine who will be the owners of these badly needed new capital investments. Corporations finance their growth from three primary sources: Retained earnings, debt, and various tax benefits—primarily equipment writeoffs, such as those which form the bulk of the business tax relief in the Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981.

Because of the way in which new investments are financed, capital ownership in the United States has historically been an opportunity reserved for a relative few. The ownership of new capital wealth is, and continues to be, largely a function of existing capital wealth.

Free enterprise, private property economies are losing ground all over the world. Rather than blindly continuing to make the already rich richer still, would not we be better off demonstrating to people all over the world how the bountiful, increasing prosperity that we have in America spreads out and reaches people in all walks of life?

Should we not provide a more hopeful model, a model that steadily strengthens the foundations of free enterprise by steadily increasing the number of people who directly share a stake in its productive strength? If we had such a model, other nations would be far more likely to follow our lead and would be far more likely to survive as democracies.

What could be a better answer to the unfulfilled promises of communism? What if the members of Solidarity, for example, were to own those plants where they now work? Would that not largely undermine the very rationale for Soviet-style state ownership?

In an apparent reference to the Polish crisis, Pope Paul II explained in his September 15, 1981, encyclical "Laborem Exercens" (On Human Work) that—

> * * * Merely converting the means of production into state property in the collectivist system is by no means equivalent to "socializing" that property. We can speak of socializing only when . . . on the basis of his work each person is fully entitled to consider himself a part-owner of the great workbench at which he is working with everyone else. A way toward that goal could be found by associating labor with the ownership of capital. * * *

The distribution of job opportunities as an outgrowth of Government-stimulated economic growth is a factor that we evaluate in great detail. But is that enough? In this technology-rich, capital-intensive age in which we live, should not the American worker have more of a stake in the economy than just a job?

We in the United States have been asking the wrong question. Or, at best, an incomplete question. Is it not time to begin to ask just who will own this massive amount of new capital that our new tax laws will help to bring about. Is it not time to look to the future wealth of this Nation and to insure that some significant portion of that wealth is owned by those whose toil will help to create it?

The bulk of working Americans—or working people anywhere for that matter—cannot save their way to significant capital ownership. For the most part, people cannot afford capital ownership. Daily economic survival, not savings and investment, is their main concern.

Most working people owe instead of own. And the less our technologically advanced economy needs their labor, the less able they are to save their way to capital ownership. Inflation, of course, further penalizes what little savings they are able to set aside.

What is needed is a transformation of our current techniques of finance. The financial press estimates that by the year 2000 productive wealth in the United States will increase by $2 to $5 trillion. The bulk of that new wealth will be owned by private individuals. Techniques of corporate finance will determine who those owners will be.

We need to reevaluate our techniques of finance, and begin to ask whether we can afford to encourage techniques which continue to perpetuate our concentrated pattern of property ownership. If we are to expect our free enterprise system to be embraced by others, we should set a better example of how our system can work to advance the interests of more American citizens. As Secretary of State Haig has pointed out, our economic contradictions here at home make it more difficult for us to lead abroad.

We live in an ideological age, an age in which it is all the more important to have a clear vision of the type of society that we would suggest to others. If we are going to preach private ownership abroad, we should practice it here at home in a realistic fashion.

In a July 1974 speech to the Young Americans for Freedom, the President, then Governor Reagan, explained the historical precedent for a national policy of expanded ownership and endorsed the uniquely American opportunity that such a policy would represent:

> Over one hundred years ago, Abraham Lincoln signed the Homestead Act. There was a wide distribution of land and they didn't confiscate anyone's already owned land. They did not take from those who owned and give to others who did not own. It set the pattern for the American capitalist system. We need an Industrial Homestead Act . . . I know that plans have been suggested in the past and they all had one flaw.
> They were based on making present owners give up some of their ownership to the nonowners. Now this isn't true of the ideas that are being talked about today.
> Very simply, these business leaders have come to the realization that it is time to formulate a plan to accelerate economic growth and production and at the same time broaden the ownership of productive capital. The American dream has always been to have a piece of the action.

In a similar vein, Senator Hubert Humphrey explained his support of expanded ownership in a letter to the editor of the Washington Post not long before his death:

> Throughout my career as a public servant, I have viewed full employment as a top priority goal for this country. And I continue to do so. But I recognize that capital, and the question of who owns it and therefore reaps the benefit of its productiveness, is an extremely important issue that is complementary to the issue of full employment.
> I see these as twin pillars of our economy: Full employment of our labor resources and widespread ownership of our capital resources. Such twin pillars would go a long way in providing a firm underlying support for future economic growth that would be equitably shared.

Expanded ownership is an issue that cuts across party lines in an attempt to bring out the best in our American free enterprise system.

I am pleased to see that there is support for this concept on both sides of the aisle. I am pleased that the Republican Party in its 1980 convention spoke of this issue in its platform:

> The widespread distribution of private property ownership is the cornerstone of American liberty. Without it, neither our free enterprise system nor our republican form of government could long endure.

It is my hope that we will begin to strike a better balance between the energy and efficiency of the market and the equity, compassion and equality of democracy. Financial techniques supportive of expanded ownership would bring a democratic new dimension to the investment process, and would open new possibilities for economic participation.

We need a more democratic form of private property capitalism—a type of capitalism that is true to its democratic roots, and true to the American tradition of widespread participation.

If we are to urge others on to a new direction for economic policy, we would do well to strike out in that direction ourselves. As President Reagan once explained:

> Capitalism hasn't used the best tool of all in its struggle against socialism—and that's capitalism itself.

If we are to suggest to others a blueprint for social progress, we should ourselves favor a financial design guaranteed to include more Americans as partners in our economic progress. If we are to expect our private property philosophy to survive elsewhere, we need to show that it can thrive here in the United States.

In addition to providing ideological direction to American foreign policy, a policy of expanded private ownership would also provide a private enterprise alternative to traditional reform movements. In addition to including ever larger numbers of people as beneficiaries of the development process, this policy would also provide a mechanism through which U.S. aid could encourage development in a more democratic fashion.

President Reagan is correct in his belief that we must "transcend communism." We can do that only with an ideological self assurance that is well grounded in values that we know are sound.

Building a more peaceful world—

As President Reagan noted in his state of the Union address, requires a sound strategy and the national resolve to back it up.

Expanded ownership is such a strategy. It could make the crucial difference between peaceful change or disorder and violence.

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, I share the views of the distinguished Senator from Louisiana and congratulate him on what I think is a statement that should have been said time and time again in this country, and it is part of the basic economic structure of the country. He stated it in an eloquent and articulate manner.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR BENTSEN

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Texas is recognized.

WORLD AGRICULTURAL TRADE

THE COMMON AGRICULTURAL POLICY OF THE EUROPEAN COMMUNITY

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, I am concerned about what is happening to the family farm in this country.

I do not believe that it has been fully realized how important international trade and exports happen to be to the family farmer. He is a big part of that.

But all we have to do is read the right-hand column in the Wall Street Journal of Monday to understand this importance. This article, which I put in the RECORD yesterday, tells what has happened to our exports in grain, the fall off there, and the reaction in falling prices and in turn the foreclosures for American farmers.

But part of it is being brought about by a dramatic change that is taking place in the European Community. What they have done with their common agricultural policy has resulted in an amazing increase in their exports and a substantial denial of markets within the European Community for American agricultural exports.

When we are talking about free trade we ought to be sure of what were getting. The old axiom is that it ought to be fair trade. But we are not seeing that. We have the largest marketing system in the world here, and it is basically an open one, open to other countries around the world, but we are seeing more and more barriers put up to our own products.

Our own U.S. negotiators must be tough and savvy to deal with this. I can recall in Geneva when we were talking about GATT and trying to do something about cracking the market in EC countries for U.S. agricultural products. I kept saying, "Let's get something done for grapefruit, for oranges in our country." I was particularly interested because we produce a lot of grapefruit and oranges down in south Texas.
